SMITH: "Harder up than ever, old man? So am I." Jones: "Seen Spitkins lately?" Smith: "No; that small sum I borrowed of him has estranged us." Jones: "Ah, there's one comfort, dear boy; I and U will never be separated by an O."

AN up-town man who surprised his cook smoking one of his choice Connecticut cigars was cut short in his reproof by her asking the conundrum, "If domestic cigars ain't intended for the use of us domestics, what are they called by our name for?"

AT Boston they are too truly good and learned to quote Byron undiluted, and so hav prepared a special version of one of his best known poems, as follows:

"Maid of Boston, ere we separate us
Giv me back my cardiac apparatus."

IN a railroad collision the other day a young lady's old style bonnet was crushed and dented in seventeen different places. She took it home, put a flower and two yards of ribbon on it, and now has a bonnet of latest style worth eleven dollars and a half.

HE took her fancy when he came,
He took her hand, he took a kiss;
He took no notice of the shame
That glowed her happy cheek at this.

He took to coming afternoons,
He took an oath he'd ne'er deceive;
He took her father's silver spoons,
And after that he took his leave.

A "RUBBER-HEADED tack" has been invented by a misguided man. The Albany Evening Journal remarks that "everybody who has sat down in peace and risen in wrath knows that the head of a tack is not the end which needs improvement with a rubber point."

BRING forth the linen duster,
That I used to wear;
Hang up my winter wrapper
For I feel the summer air. —Plato.

Down slave! Why thus prevaricate?
Hast pawned my linen summer suit,
Or the cool straw hat ate? —Cicero.

Perhaps I'll go in swimming,
Perhaps I'll take some beer,
Perhaps I'll sweat and swelter here;
But I think not, not next year. —Solomon.

A FUNNY OLD STORY.

Tom Marshall was engaged in the trial of a case in the interior of Kentucky, when a decision of the judge struck him as so bad that he rose and said:

"There never was such a ruling as that since Pontius Pilate presided at the trial of Christ."

"Mr. Cierk," responded the Judge, "fine Mr. Marshall $10 for contempt of court."

"I confess your honor," continued Tom, "that what I said was a little hard on Pontius Pilate, but it is the first time in the history of Kentucky jurisprudence that it is held that to speak disrespectfully of Pontius Pilate is contempt of court."

"Mr. Clerk, make the fine $20 for continuous contempt," said the judge solemnly.

"Well, Judge," Tom added, "as you won all my money last night at poker, lend me the twenty."

"Mr. Clerk," cried the judge, hastily, "remit the fine. The state can afford to lose the money better than I can."

"I congratulate the court upon its return to a sane condition," said Tom, resuming his seat amid roars of laughter.

MIKE'S CONFESSION.

Now Mike was an ostler of very good parts,
Yet sly as a church-mouse was he;
And he came to confess to the new parish priest,
Like a pious and true devotee.

When his sins were reeled off till no more could be found,
Said the priest: "Are you sure you've told all?
Hav the mouths of the horses never been greased,
So they couldn't eat oats in the stall?"

"With rispect to your riv'rence," said Mike, with a grin,
"Sure for that ye may lave me alone;
I've scraped till there's niver a sin left behoined—
Me conscience is clane to the bone!"

So absolved, happy Mike went away for more sins,
Till the day came around to tell all;
And the very first thing he confessed, he had greased
The mouth of each horse in the stall!

"How is this?" said the priest. "When here, but last week,
You never had done this, you swore?"
"Faith, thanks to yer riv'rence," said Mike, "such a thing
"I niver heerd of before!"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 31. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, July 30, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

AN English writer estimates that there are forty thousand Americans in England to-day.

IT is perfectly safe to think a man is a fool, but not always safe to say it, so little freedom of speech hav we, even in this country.

DR. BEARD says that people in a trance state are able—though rarely—to see with thoroughly bandaged eyes. The tests were made with playing cards.

IT is rumored that Prof. Huxley may be a candidate for the Linacre Professorship of Physiology in the University of Oxford, vacant by the death of Dr. Rolleston.

THE Japanese government has appointed a special commissioner to study the subject of cremation, and he is now investigating the merits of the Italian system at Milan.

EARTHQUAKES in Switzerland, torrid heat all over Europe, and more tornadoes in Minnesota are among the contributions of the last few days to the calendar of prodigies for the year 1881.

MORE than 240,000 immigrants landed at the port of New York during the first half of this year. At that rate, more than 450,000 of these crusaders will have reached us by the end of December.

THE British Museum has obtained from Babylon a statuet of Hercules seated on a rock, over which is thrown the lion's skin; his left hand rested on the club, but both hands are wanting.

THE news that Schaeberle's comet has grown a tail, a forked one at that, and is aiming, head on, for the earth, will add to public interest in this new messenger of the skies, which may yet carry off the honors as the great comet of 1881.

THERE is reason for every human action. When a man out West sold a horse for a wife a neighbor shook his head and declared that there must hav been something the matter with that horse or the owner would not hav fooled him away like that.

THE Rev. Henry Knight, of Clifton, Kansas, knocked down a man who expressed a hope that the President would not recover. An eye-witness estimated the weight of the blow at thirteen thousand pounds. A church tribunal will determin the gravity of the offense.

A WRITER in the British Medical Journal asserts that in the last thirty years there has been a gradual diminution in the size of people's heads. The change was first observed by the hat manufacturers, who hav reduced the average hat two sizes during that time. Cause not stated.

A CHINESE mother at Fresno, Oregon, bandaged her little girl's feet, after the fashion of her country, and for several days the cries of the sufferer were heard throughout the mining town. Then a mob of indignant miners broke into the house, cut off the bandages, soaked the feet in liniment, and threatened to hang the woman if she renewed the process.

GEORGE I., on a journey to Hanover, stopped at a village in Holland, and while the horses were getting ready he asked for two or three eggs, which were brought to him and charged two hundred florins. "How is this?" said his majesty. "Eggs must be very scarce at this place." "Pardon me," said the host, "eggs are plentiful enough, but kings are scarce."

THE Fijian name for a doctor, on being translated, turns out to be "carpenter of death," and Miss C. F. Gordon Cumming, in her work, "At Home in Fiji," says that Dr. Macgregor, who is practicing the healing art in that part of the world, has substituted a new term, signifying "man of life," though how far it has superseded the original is not known.

THE reports from the great wheat region of the West are not encouraging. They come just when this staple cereal is in a critical condition, just when it is ripe for the chinch bug, the rust, the rain, and the tornado, but not quite ripe for the harvest. The central cereal region will apparently hav a small crop, but in the Northwest the prospects are better—in some regions even brilliant.

THE Rev. W. Whitcher, of Providence, is in deep disgrace. He has been borrowing books from the libraries and then mutilating them to some extent and selling them, making the statement that he bought them at the junk shops. He has taken a vacation; the further breaking the bread of life to the faithful lambs this hot weather is rather too vigorous exercise. He is spending a few weeks of prayer and repentance at Martha's Vineyard.

HUMAN nature is so crookedly put together, or at any rate has become so crooked through the general belief in total depravity, that if you ask a boy to go to school or to church he has all of a sudden an attack of toothache which would awaken the pity of a stone monument, whereas, even if he really has the toothache, and you invite him to go to the circus, he exhibits an ability to become indifferent to the most excruciating pain, which is very surprising.

A WOMAN who exhorts among the negroes of southern Georgia wears on her head a halo made of burnished brass, which seems to impress some of her hearers profoundly. She tells them that it was given to her by an angel in a vision as a reward for her superlativ piety, and is positivly the only one ever conferred upon anybody before reaching heaven. She claims that its possession enables her to intercede with certainty for sinners, and givs her miraculous power over disease. Probably her halo is just as good as anybody's halo.

IN the Comptes rendus of the Academy of Sciences, Mr. Camille Flammarion publishes a remarkable note showing, with strong proofs, that it is impossible to maintain the current theory on the materiality of the tails of comets, which are now supposed to be formed of the substance itself of the comet driven by a repulsiv force emanating from the sun. Mr. Flammarion maintains that the tail of a comet is simply a luminous phenomenon, an electrical or other excitation of the ether, produced by the cometary star in the trace of its shadow. This theory is beginning to number many partisans.

MR. BRADLAUGH intends to turn the tables upon his vindictiv persecutors. He has discovered that a Conservativ member of Parliament advanced to the informer the funds necessary for legal expenses in Mr. Bradlaugh's prosecution, and advised the proceedings against him. In doing this he rendered himself liable to criminal action for the crime of maintenance. All lovers of fair play and liberty of opinion will rejoice that Mr. Bradlaugh now has it in his power to punish at least one of the bigots who hav sought to deprive his constituents of the representativ of their choice.

THE Rev. James H. Bourns, a member of the Chicago Presbytery, is in trouble, serious trouble, too. Last Monday, when the presbytery met in Chicago, formal charges were preferred against the alleged erring brother. They were to the effect that common fame charges him with the sin of "deception and dishonesty in business, in violation of his ordination vows, and to the manifest injury of his reputation as a Christian, and to the shame and reproach of the Christian religion of which he is a minister." The particular sins of Bro. Bourns are said to be the obtaining of money under false pretenses, the borrowing of money without intent to pay, and of converting money collected for charitable purposes to his own use and for his own benefit. These are very serious charges against a Presbyterian minister, and it is to be hoped that at his trial the Rev. Jas. H. Bourns can show common fame to be wrong.

MR. BRADLAUGH has summoned a meeting of his supporters in Trafalgar square on the evening of the 2d of August to make an orderly protest against his exclusion from the House of Commons. In the case of Clark against Bradlaugh, before a special jury—an action to recover £500 penalty from the defendant for having sat and voted in the House of Commons without taking the Parliamentary oath—the jury on the 22d inst. made a verdict for the plaintiff. The only question for the jury to determin was whether the writ in this suit was actually issued after or before Mr. Bradlaugh voted in the House.

THE Freethinkers are more Liberal in matters of discussion than the orthodox brethren. Apparently they hav enough faith in their unbelief to be free from all fear of the verbal onslaughts of their adversaries. At their convention at Hornellsville, to commence on the 31st of August, according to their announcement, they will welcome to their platform any orthodox minister of good standing in his denomination and of sufficient ability to fairly represent the Christian church, and grant him the same privileges and hospitality as they grant other speakers, besides paying his expenses. This is a very different method of getting at truth than that of Dr. Deems's philosophers, who admit no one to their discussions without proof in advance that he agrees with them.—Truth.

MR. BURNHAM WARDWELL, ex-warden of the Virginia state prison, and a laborer in the cause of prison reform, spoke in Hartford on Sunday night. He bitterly attacked the Connecticut prison system, especially that relating to their religious instruction. He said that the convicts were assembled in the most ironclad way, and the chaplain mocked God and disgraced humanity by going through with what is called religious exercises. The chaplain, Mr. Howard, happened to be present, and after the meeting told the speaker that his remarks were outrageous and shameful. Mr. Wardwell undertook to explain that his words had been misconstrued, but Mr. Howard indignantly left the church. The audience sided with the chaplain, and so Mr. Wardwell's effort at prison reform was not successful.

CLARION presbytery in western Pennsylvania is much disturbed over a case of disciplin growing out of a dance. Mr. Donaldson was some months ago suspended from the Pennsylvania church for dancing. He appealed from the decision of the church session to presbytery. In presbytery he defended himself in a spirited speech which lasted for two hours. Notwithstanding his eloquence, the presbytery floored him in the test vote, which stood twenty-two against him and only one in his favor. The trial consumed one whole day, and called forth many severe remarks from the brethren of the presbytery on the heinousness of the sin of dancing. Outsiders took a warm interest in the proceedings, and waited in earnest expectation for the verdict. One of the most remarkable features of the case is that Mr. Donaldson cannot dance, but only tried to. His brethren made no allowance for his lack of skilfulness, but adjudged him quite as guilty for trying to dance as if he had succeeded in executing the most sylph-like movements. Mr. Donaldson is in hopes that the brethren who compose the synod will look with less disfavor on his futile attempts to trip the light fantastic toe. Therefore he has appealed to the synod, which meets in October in Erie, Pa. It so happens that there is not in all the Bible any command against dancing. It would be very hard to disciplin any Presbyterian for this alleged offense in the churches connected with the presbyteries of New York or Brooklyn. Dancing is so customary among the church-members, especially among the younger ones, that any attempt at disciplin for it would array a large proportion of the membership on the side of the accused. The Donaldson case, when it comes up to synod, will be one of great general interest.

News of the Week.

THE President had a serious relapse last Saturday. A cavity formed around the bullet which filled with pus and caused a chill, succeeded by violent fever. An incision was made in his back through which the pus was discharged, after which the fever left him, and he is now progressing again toward health.

AN earthquake occurred on the 22d in Switzerland and in the eastern part of France. At Geneva bells were rung and houses shaken. At Morges furniture in dwellings was upset, and here was great consternation, but no casualities. It was also severe at Berne, Switzerland, and at Lyons and Grenoble, France.

ELBRIDGE G. LAPHAM was on last Saturday elected to fill the senatorial vacancy occasioned by Conkling's resignation. Both senators being elected, the legislature adjourned. Lapham is about the same kind of a man as Miller, and neither will reflect any honor upon the state nor do anything for the people against the monopolists.

A FURIOUS and destructiv storm passed over Hadlyme, Conn., on the 21st. Hail fell to the depth of one inch, while the rain fell in torrents. The tobacco crop is almost a total loss. Corn, in many instances, is cut clean off. Apple-trees a foot in diameter were wrenched off. Fences were blown down, and under almost every tree birds were found dead. The damage will aggregate many thousands of dollars.

MR. BRADLAUGH has been advised that the payment of £200 and the execution of indemnity bonds by Mr. Charles Newdegate, Conservativ M. P., the instigator of the Bradlaugh prosecution, to Clarke, a common informer, renders Mr. Newdegate liable to proceedings for maintenance; and Mr. Bradlaugh intends to sue Mr. Newdegate for damages to cover the whole of the expenses to which he has been put. According to Russell on Crimes, a person is guilty of maintenance who shall provide money, or otherwise aid in the prosecution of a suit to which he is not personally a party.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

SECOND BOOK.—CHAPTER I.

When we were together in the conservatory the abbé drew forth a note-book. "Here," said he, "is Alamontada's story as I with the greatest care hav put it together. I gave to it all only the united thread; they are Alamontada's thoughts and words that I hav strung upon it. Many a thing you will find therein very short, others again very minutely related, according as the narrator was more or less touched by the affairs of his past, or my questions induced him thereto."

Our curiosity was excited in the highest degree. To me it had become quite incomprehensible how a galley-slave could possess such mature wisdom, such manifold accomplishments, or how such a man through sentence of a court could be brought to that cruel disgrace. At any rate this man always remained a most remarkable being, as remarkable as were his views of the world. What tenderness of feeling, united with greatness of mind! What heroism of purest virtue, and what hard fate for it! How vanishes beneath his loftiness the greatness of those heroes of antiquity, which makes us tremble only through the magic work of the poets! A spirit like that of the beloved slave is far beyond the reach of all poetic description. Forsaken, unassuming, and therefore the nobler, his virtue walked over degrading sensuality, noticeable only to the eye of reason. The poet, while touching the chords of emotion, loves to behold objects of the sensual world only; even his gods he clothes in shining colors.

But let me hasten to the story. Dillon, shaded by the leaves of the grapevine at the window, read. Never shall I forget this beautiful hour.

CHAPTER II.

A small village in Languedoc was my home and the place of my birth (so began Alamontada). I lost my mother very early. My father, a poor peasant, could, in spite of his economy, spare but little for my education. Yet he was by far not the poorest in the village. But, besides the tithes from his vinyard, oliv-trees, and fields, he must giv from the remainder of his scanty profits, gained by hard labor, one-fourth for various taxes. Our daily food was soup with black bread and turnips.

My father became distressed. This pained him very much. "O Colas!" said he more than once to me in grieved tones, laying his hand upon my head, "my hopes perish. I shall not be able, notwithstanding the sweat of my brow, to gain for myself a coffin free from debt. How then shall I redeem the word given to thy mother with my last kiss upon her deathbed? I promised her so sacredly to keep thee at school, and make a clergyman of thee. Thou wilt become a day-laborer, and serve others!"

Thereupon I consoled the good old man as well as I could. But my childish consolation only afflicted him still more. He became more sickly and felt the approach of his last days. He often looked at me moved, full of sorrow for my future; and the bitter tears of hopelessness wet his eyes. I left my play when I saw this. I ran up to him, for I could not bear to see him weep. I threw my arms around his neck, kissed the tears from his eyelashes, and exclaimed, sobbing, "O my father, do not weep!"

What a happy people might inhabit that country, where the fertil soil yields two crops yearly to its tillers, and olivs and grapes ripen abundantly under the warm rays of the sun! But over the blooming earth drags heavily a crushed race, which must giv the fruit of its distress and want to feasting bishops, who, for the sufferings here below, promis to it unceasing pleasure in the life to come; givs its gain to noblemen and princes, who in return would rule the land with kindness and wisdom. A banquet at the royal court swallowed up a whole year's fruit of an entire province, which was wrested from the lap of the earth under millions of sighs and under millions of sweat-drops.

I was eighteen years old when my father died. It was a pleasant evening, the sun about to set. My father sat before the hut, in the shade of the chestnut-tree. He would once more enjoy the view of the world, which, in spite of all suffering, had become dear to him. I came from the field. He was very weak. I went to him. He embraced me. "O my son!" said he, "now I feel well. My work is done, and I go to rest. Yet I shall not forget thee. I shall stand before the throne of God with thy mother; we will pray for thee above the stars. Think of us, and be true to virtue until death; we will pray for thee. God cares for thee. And weep not, for if once thy day's work is done, for thee also will come the hour of rest. Then thou wilt again find us above, me and thy mother. Ah! Colas, with what longing will we there await thee, and how joyfully will beat again the three hearts of parents and child on one another, before the throne of God!"

The last ray of the sun faded on the mountain-peaks; and the gloom of twilight spread over the earth. The spirit of my father was free from the frail body that enveloped it. His dear remains lay in my arms.

CHAPTER III.

The faithful servant—his name I hav forgotten—who was to bring me, according to the last will of my father, to my mother's brother, Mr. Etienne, in Nismes, held me by the hand as we walked through its dark, narrow streets. I trembled. An irrepressible shudder seized my soul.

"Thou tremblest, Colas," said the servant. "Thou lookest pale and gloomy. Art thou not well?"

"Ah!" cried I, "do not bring me hither in this dark stone labyrinth. I feel as if I had to die here. Let me be a day laborer in my free, green home. Look at these walls—they stand like walls of prisons. And these people, they seem so restless, so gloomy, as if they were criminals."

"Thy uncle, the miller, does not liv in this town; his house is before the Carmelite-gate,* in the free, green country."

The secret power is ascribed to the soul to anticipate its future fate. When I had become a companion of the frightful tragedy, the history of which has filled with terror the hearts of all feeling humanity, I recollected this first sad, anxious feeling of my soul, which I experienced on first entering the streets of gloomy Nismes, and looked at it as a foreboding. Even the most enlightened man cannot entirely cut loose from superstitious fear, when his despairing hope in vain feels around in the dark for aid.

The impression that Nismes had made upon me remained with me forever. As I was accustomed to liv in and with free nature, lonely and simple, I was scared by the commotion of the crowd of people of this busy city. My mother had rocked me under the branches of the oliv-tree, and in the green, pleasant dusk of the chestnut-groves I had dreamed my childhood away. How was I able to endure it between these dark, narrow, walls, where only thirst for gain brings people together? In solitude the passions die; the heart becomes as quiet as the surrounding landscape. On that account I was frightened at the first sight of so many human faces in which anger and care, pride and avarice, revelry and envy, had left their traces, which he no longer notices who sees them day by day.

Before the gate of the Carmelite was the house of my uncle and near it his mill. The servant pointed with his hand to the pretty building, and said:

"Mr. Etienne is a rich man, but too bad—"

"And what then too bad?"

"A Calvinist, as people say."

I did not understand him. We entered the fine building. My anxiety vanished at my entrance. A quiet, homelike feeling spoke to me from everything that I saw, and I began to feel as well as in my own home.

In the neat room full of simplicity and order sat the mother at the table, surrounded by three blooming daughters, busy with domestic work. A two-year-old boy sat in the mother's lap playing. Goodness and calmness dwelt in every face. They were all silent, and fastened their eyes upon me. My uncle stood at the window and read in a book. Already his locks were gray, but a youthful cheerfulness beamed in his looks. His features were the features of piety.

The servant said to him: "This is your nephew Colas, Mr. Etienne. For his father, your sister's husband, has died, and in poverty. Therefore he commanded me to bring his son to you, that you might be his father."

"Be welcomed and blessed, Colas!" said Mr. Etienne, as he laid his hands upon my head, "I will be thy father."

Then the woman arose, took my hand, and said, "I will be thy mother."

This kindness moved my heart. I wept, and kissed the hands of the new father and the new mother, without being able to speak a word. Thereupon the three daughters surrounded me and said, "Do not weep, Colas; we are thy sisters."

From this moment I was as familiar in this new home as if I had never been a stranger therein. I believed to liv in a family of quiet angels, of whom my father oft had told me. I became as pious as they all, and yet was never the most pious.

I was kept at school. Half a year afterward Mr. Etienne stepped up to me, and said with friendly look: "Colas, thou art poor, but God has blessed thee with beautiful talents. Thy teachers all praise to me thy diligence and that thou excellest all thy school-fellows in learning. Therefore hav I concluded that thou shalt study the sciences, and become a learned man. When thou has finished thy school-years in Nismes, I shall send thee to the university at Montpellier. Thou shalt study law, and then thou canst become a defender of our oppressed church. I see in thee an instrument of God for our rescue, and a protector of the evangelical faith against the cruelties and abuses of the papists."

Mr. Etienne was a secret Protestant, as with him a few thousands in Nismes and the surrounding country were. He initiated me into his faith. The Protestants were industrious, quiet, benevolent citizens; but the anger of the people and the rage of the monks persecuted the unfortunate ones even into their very houses. They lived in constant fear; but this kept the fire of piety the more activ in all hearts. Compelled, and for name's sake, we visited the church of the Catholics, celebrated their holidays, and kept the pictures of their saints in our rooms. Yet neither this concession nor the laborious piety of the persecuted assuaged the hatred of the persecutor.

The Case of the Chevalier de la Barre.

The scene of the events now to be related was Abbeville, a small city of the north of France, on the navigable river Somme, twelve miles from the English Channel. There was a convent there, the abbess of which was a lady of distinguished family, a highly agreeable and attractiv woman. A magistrate of the vicinity, Duval by name, a man sixty years of age, much employed in the business affairs of the convent, fell in love with her, and pressed his suit with offensiv importunity. The abbess sent for her nephew, Chevalier de la Barre, to come and liv in the town, promising to use her influence in procuring for him the object of his ambition—a commission in a regiment of cavalry. He was the son of a lieutenant-general who had squandered a large estate, and he looked to his aunt for the influence which alone could advance him in the military profession.

The abbess often invited him and his companions to supper, to the exclusion of Duval, who conceived a violent animosity against the young man, and he, on his part, treated the elderly magistrate with aggravating hauteur. La Barre was twenty years of age, ill-instructed, a reader of scandalous books, but by no means of a perverse or depraved character. He was simply a very young French gentleman of that period; neither worse nor better than many others.

It was a bad time for young men of family and education, who, above all others, need the restraints and the inspirations of a true religion. For them the old religion was a dead thing; they saw the brightest spirits of the age pelting its ghastly and sumptuous corpse; and there was as yet no hint or hope of one which could assist them to control their propensities and ennoble their purposes.

On a certain night in August, 1765, a foolish deed was done in Abbeville that filled the region round about with horror and consternation. A wooden crucifix which stood upon an old bridge over the Somme was hacked with a knife in many places and in such a way as to permit no doubt that the mutilation was done purposely. On the same night a crucifix in one of the cemeteries of the city was covered with mud. Upon the discovery of these injuries the people were thrown into the same kind of affright as that which used to seize the people of ancient Athens when an image of Minerva was supposed to hav been profaned and the goddess made angry with her own beloved city. The bishop of the diocese inflamed the general excitement. An austere and zealous prelate, he arranged a solemn procession to avert the anger of heaven from Abbeville. The bishop himself, with bare feet and a cord round his neck, marched at its head, and, kneeling before the image, he invoked mercy upon those who had profaned it—men, he said, who were not beyond the reach of heavenly mercy, though they had "rendered themselvs worthy of the severest punishments known to this world's law." An indulgence of forty days was granted to all of either sex who should visit the injured crucifix, now transported to the principal church of the city. That church was filled all day with worshipers. Processions of various orders and societies were seen every hour going toward it, chanting psalms as they went. The religious fervor of the people was by these expedients excited to the highest degree; and that species of fervor is closely akin to the direst cruelty.

One of those terrible monitoires was read in all the churches, threatening vague perdition against all persons having knowledge of the matter, "whether by hearsay or otherwise," who should fail to declare it. The usual mad rumors ran from circle to circle; a new sect had been formed, sworn to break all images and tread the sacrament under foot. The Jews were at their old familiar work of profaning Christian emblems.

Then it was that Duval, blinded by jealous hate, pointed to the Chevalier de la Barre as the probable perpetrator of the "sacrilege;" and, in his character of magistrate, he inquired into all the past life of the young man, questioning valets, servants, workmen. He discovered no proof, and none was ever discovered, that La Barre had defaced the crucifix on the bridge. He learned that the young man and two of his companions had once passed within thirty yards of a procession bearing the sacrament without taking off their hats. La Barre confessed as much, and attributed the omission to his being too late for dinner. Duval also ascertained that these young roysterers had been in the habit of singing loose ditties and chanting Rabelaisian litanies; particularly a certain song written by Piron in his youth and known to most young men of that period. Armed with such testimony as this, the infuriate Duval formally denounced the chevalier, which compelled the magistrates of Abbeville to investigate the charge.

A crowd of witnesses (seventy-seven in all) came forward to testify. Half a dozen young men of Abbeville were accused of singing the objectionable songs and uttering the burlesque litanies. One of them was Duval's own son, who took to flight, as did others of the accused. The rooms of La Barre, D'Etallonde, and the rest were searched. Among their books were found several light novels of the day; also one of Voltaire's Deistical poems, the "Epistle to Uranie," and the two little volumes just published of the "Philosophical Dictionary," works to be found in thousands of rooms all over Europe. Duval pushed on the prosecution with all the fury of a David of Toulouse, encouraged, as he was, by the applause of all priests and many people. Fortunately, D'Etallonde escaped in time and reached the dominions of the king of Prussia, where, having spent all his money, and being in danger of starvation, he enlisted as a soldier in a regiment posted at Vesel. Another of the accused, a lad of fifteen, saved himself by confessing that he and his young friends had indeed sung the songs, said the litanies, and bowed in mock homage to the books.

La Barre alone was a prisoner; but D'Etallonde was condemned and sentenced, as though he, too, had been in the power of the court. He was but eighteen years of age; La Barre was scarcely twenty. The crimes of which they were found guilty were thus described by the court: "Wickedly, and from impiety, passing with deliberate steps before the holy sacrament without taking off the hat or kneeling; uttering blasphemies against God, the holy eucharist, the holy virgin, the religion and commandments of God and of the church; singing two songs filled with execrable and abominable blasphemies against God, the holy eucharist, the holy virgin, and the saints, male and female; rendering marks of adoration and respect to infamous books; profaning the sign of the cross, the mystery of the consecration of the wine, and the benedictions in use in churches and among Christians."

These were the offenses of the young men. Thousands of merry priests had committed the same when they read and laughed over their much-loved Rabelais; and thousands of French ladies also, when they copied the light verses of the time into their diaries and read them aloud to their companions at supper. La Barre, present, and D'Etallonde, absent, were condemned to be subjected to the torture, ordinary and extraordinary, to extort the names of their "accomplices;" to hav their tongues torn out by the roots with pincers of iron; to hav their right hands cut off at the door of the principal church of Abbeville; to be drawn in a cart to the market-place, and there, having been bound to stakes by iron chains, to be burned to death by a slow fire. In consideration of La Barre's presence, the sentence was mitigated in his case so far that he was allowed to be beheaded before being burned. The court further ordered that some of the books found in their rooms, particularly the "Philosophical Dictionary," should be cast into the fire with their bodies, and consumed with them.

No rational being seems to hav thought at the time that this hideous sentence would be carried into effect. Extraordinary efforts were made to save a life so young and so innocent. An appeal was taken. Ten of the first advocates of Paris joined in a declaration that, in their opinion, the sentence was illegal. The prisoner was removed to Paris, where the case was examined by a court of twenty-five judges, fifteen of whom voted to confirm the sentence; and the young man was sent back to Abbeville, followed by five executioners, supposed to be competent to execute it.

He bore the long, unspeakable anguish of the fatal day with a fortitude that is absolutely without parallel. The confessor who was assigned him was an old friend of his aunt, the abbess, often her guest, with whom the chevalier had merrily supped many a time at the convent. He dined with this priest before his torments began. "Let us," said the prisoner, "take a little nourishment; you will hav need of strength as much as I to bear the spectacle I am going to giv." He could even jest. At the close of the meal he said, "Let us hav some coffee; it will not prevent my sleeping." The executioners themselvs proved unequal to the task they had undertaken, and only pretended to tear out his tongue. At the scaffold, therefore, he was still able to speak. Just before mounting it, he quietly said to the priest, "I did not believe a young gentleman could be put to death for so little a thing." One of the executioners came forward to cut his hair. "Why," said the prisoner, "do you wish to make me look like a choir boy?" The executioner from Paris, who was to giv the final stroke of the axe, then presented himself. "Are your arms strong?" said La Barre. "Was it not you who cut off the head of the Count of Lally?" "Yes, monsieur," replied the man. "You missed, did you not?" "He was in a bad position," said the executioner. "Place yourself properly, and I will not fail you." "Fear nothing," said the prisoner. "I will place myself aright and not play the baby." He laid his head upon the block, and again spoke with the most perfect serenity, "Is that right?" The executioner did his work with such dexterity that he was rewarded by a general clapping of hands.

Thus perished, July 1, 1766, almost within sight of the white cliffs of humane England, this heroic youth, to the horror of what was called "all France;" that is, to the horror of the few thousands of people who, by sharing the intellectual life of France, had escaped the domination of l'Infâme.

No event of his whole lifetime so deeply moved Voltaire as this execution. He was ready to abandon his country. When the news reached Ferney that, in spite of the argument of the ten advocates, the fell sentence had been carried into effect, he was incoherent with rage, alarm, amazement, and compassion. He dashed upon paper, July 16, 1766, a wild letter to the D'Argentals, imploring further information:

"The atrocity of this affair seizes me with horror and wrath. I repent having ruined myself in building and doing good within the boundaries of a country where barbarities are committed in cold blood and going to dinner which would make drunken savages shudder. And this is a people so gentle, so light, and so gay! Man-devouring harlequins! I wish no more to hear you spoken of. Run from the stake to a ball, and from the place of execution to the comic opera; break Calas upon the wheel; hang Sirven; burn five poor young men, who, as my angels say, ought only to hav been put six months in St. Lazarus. I cannot breathe the same air as you. My angels, I conjure you once more to tell me all you know. The Inquisition is insipid in comparison with your Jansenists of the Grand-Chamber and the Tournelle. There is no law whatever which orders horrors like these in such a case; only the devil could be capable of burning men in the teeth of the law. What! the caprice of five old fools shall suffice to inflict penalties which would hav made Busiris tremble? I stop, for I should say much more. I hav already said too much of demons; I wish only to love my angels."

As more exact information reached him, his indignation increased. He wondered that, in the presence of such horrors, the gay and brilliant life of Paris could continue. His countrymen, he said, were monkeys, who could at any moment become tigers. He formed the serious design of abandoning France and founding a colony of philosophers in the dominions of the king of Prussia, whence, with their own printing-press, they would inundate the universe with works against l'Infâme.

Not the less did he exert himself to undo a portion of the mischief which had been done against the laws of France by the ministers of the law. He wrote immediately one of his little pamphlets, entitled "Narrativ of the Death of the Chevalier de la Barre," a simple, graphic account of the matter, which no one could resist. In 1775, at the beginning of the next reign, he followed this with one still more powerful and affecting, addressed to the young King Louis XVI., called the "Cry of Innocent Blood," in which he gave an outline of the hearsay testimony upon which the young man had been condemned. The object of this was to procure a formal reversal of the abominable judgment.

Meanwhile, the youthful D'Etallonde, a young man of education and singular refinement, was shouldering a musket in a Prussian regiment, without hope of a happier destiny. When he had served some months Voltaire was so fortunate as to discover his whereabouts from a Prussian officer who visited him at Ferney. January 13, 1767, he wrote to the young soldier the following letter:

"A man who has been sensibly touched by your misfortunes, monsieur, and who is still penetrated with horror at the cruel fate of one of your friends, infinitely desires to be of service to you. Hav the goodness to giv information as to what vocation you feel yourself best suited; whether you speak German; if your handwriting is good; if you would like a situation at the court of some prince of Germany, or with some lord as reader, secretary, librarian; whether you are still engaged in the service of his majesty, the king of Prussia; whether you wish that your discharge should be asked of him; and whether you can be recommended to him as a man of letters. In the latter case, he would hav to be informed of your name, your age, and your misfortune. He would be touched by it; he detests barbarians; he thinks your condemnation abominable.

"Do not inquire who writes to you, but write a long detail to Geneva, to M. Misopriest, care of M. Souchai, cloth merchant, at the Golden Lion. Hav the goodness to say ro M. Haas, at whose house you lodge, that he shall be reimbursed the postage of all the letters which will be sent to you under cover.

"Also, monsieur, will you be pleased to inform us how much your father allows you per annum, and if you receive pay at Vesel? Nothing more can be said to you at present, and your answer is waited for."

The young man promptly replied, transmitting the information requested with modesty, intelligence, and grace. Voltaire sent his answer to the king of Prussia, and wrote again to D'Etallonde, giving him good hopes of a better lot.

"The king of Prussia," he wrote, "knows that you are only guilty of having inconsiderately mocked a superstition which all men of sense detest from the bottom of their hearts. You laughed at the grimaces of monkeys in the country of monkeys, and the monkeys tore you. . . . My first intention was to place you in an establishment which was projected at Clèves. But this scheme encountered obstacles; it has been deranged; and the goodness of the king whom you serve appears to me at present a precious resource. He who writes to you desires passionately to be of service to you; and, if he could, he would make the barbarians repent who treated children with so much inhumanity."

All happened as he hoped it would. The king of Prussia gave the young man a commission in his service, and allowed him at once a long leave of absence, that he might visit Ferney. Voltaire sent him a sum of money to defray his traveling expenses, and gave him the welcome due to his sufferings and to his amiable disposition. He detained him at Ferney more than a year and a half, during which the young officer studied mathematics, fortification, surveying, drawing, and whatever else might fit him for a military career. "His good sense," wrote Voltaire, "his prudence, his assiduity in labor, and his extreme politeness gained him the hearts of all who lived at Ferney, and their number is not small." Wagnière bears similar testimony to the gentleness of his manners and the agreeableness of his person. Nine years after the awful scene at Abbeville we find Voltaire still exerting himself to procure for the young man the inheritance of his confiscated property and the restoration of his civil rights.

Upon his final settlement in Prussia, with his new accomplishments, Frederic made him a captain of engineers, and added a pension to the pay of his rank, besides giving him those marks of personal regard which are of so much importance under absolute governments. He never, I believe, obtained the restoration of his rights as a French citizen. He could hav had them, as it seems, in 1775, on condition of making a public confession of his fault, candle in hand, and asking pardon of the church upon his knees. He declined thus to degrade himself, and remained a subject of the Prussian king. Voltaire had the satisfaction of telling him, in 1775, that, among the events which inspired Turgot and his colleagues to reform the code and criminal procedure of France, none was more influential than the foul sentence pronounced at Abbeville in 1766, and executed upon his brave friend, the Chevalier de la Barre. It was through Captain D'Etallonde that the farmers of Ferney sent parcels of seeds to the king of Prussia, such as enthusiastic agriculturalists love to distribute among their friends for trial in other soils.

THE ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC NEWS.—The July issue of the Illustrated Scientific News teems with interesting illustrated articles, a few of which are as follows: The Doblear Telephone; Glass Grinding Machine; Ancient Pottery from Cyprus; Mechanical Larynx; Pleasure Car of the Days of Louis XIV; Amateur Mechanics; The remarkable Palmyra Palm; Curious Fishes; Illustrations, explaining the bursting of fly wheels; A Velocipede Carriage. In addition to the numerous engravings there is a large number of interesting, useful, and practical papers, relating to various departments of popular science. As to the great question, what becomes of man after death, we do not see that a highly educated European, left to his unassisted reason, is more likely to be in the right than a Blackfoot Indian. Not a single one of the many sciences in which we surpass the Blackfoot Indian throws the smallest light on the state of the soul after the animal life is extinct. In truth, all the philosophers, ancient and modern, who hav attempted, without the help of revelation, to prove the immortality of man, from Plato down to Franklin, appear to us to hav failed deplorably.—Macaulay.

FREE agency, in its very essence, contains liability to abuse. Yet, if you deprive man of his free agency, you subvert his nature. You may hav order from him, and regularity, as you may from the tides or the trade-winds, but you put an end to his moral character, to virtue, to merit, to accountableness, to the use, indeed, of reason.—Paley.

IT is the duty of the state to provide for the education of every child under its control. It is also the duty of the state to grant to its adult population the utmost liberty to think what it pleases and to utter what it thinks. In this manner civil and religious liberty may prevail all over the world.—Earl Russell (1792–1878).

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1881.

A Farewell Meeting.

On last Sunday evening, the 24th inst., a large number of dear and sympathetic friends, under the auspices of the Fourth New York Liberal League, gathered at the residence of Daniel E. Ryan, 231 West 37th street, for the purpose of taking by the hand the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, bidding him good-bye, and wishing him bon voyage.

The numbers which assembled on this occasion did much honor to the recipient; the double parlors were crowded to fulness, and even the hall was pretty well packed. The sincere friendship and kindly feeling evinced by the friends present was highly appreciated by the Old Man about to leave these shores for a year. The hearty hand-shakings, the kind wishes, and the earnest expressions of sympathy and good will, filled his heart to overflowing.

Among those present were Mr. D. C. Bridges, who is the compagnon de voyage; Dr. Barkany, of Antwerp, Belgium, and Mr. and Mrs. John Warr, of Paterson, N. J., who came to the city to attend the meeting and say, "God bless you!" to the one so soon to depart.

After nearly an hour spent in conversation, handshaking, etc., Mr. Ryan called the meeting to order and made an earnest, heartfelt address of ten or fifteen minutes. His remarks were very complimentary to the departing editor. He reviewed the acquaintance that had for several years existed between himself and the guest of the evening, and he hesitated not to avow that he had found him earnest, honest, and brave in the execution of what he conceived to be his duty. He was glad to hav this farewell meeting take place in his house. He was the first to take the editor by the hand when he emerged from the prison walls a little over a year ago; he accompanied him to his home and cheerfully coöperated with friends in giving the hearty welcome reception at Chickering Hall, and now he was more than glad in his own house to take him by the hand and giv the parting "good-bye." He dwelt somewhat upon the efforts in the spread of Liberalism which the editor had made, and gave expression to many kind remarks, and evinced the warmest and most abiding friendship for the person in whose honor the meeting was held. In closing, Mr. Ryan read these appropriate lines:

If I were asked what best I'd prize,
As sacred gifts conferred on me,
And which I'd hold as treasures rare,
My answer back would quickly be:
A mind that's void of all offense,
A heart as pure as sinless youth,
A will to never swerve from right,
A soul whose polar star is truth.

Mr. S. P. Putnam then read the following letter from Mr. T. B. Wakeman:

No. 93 NASSAU ST., N. Y., July 21, 1881.

MY DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I regret extremely that an engagement to lecture for Mr. Chainey at Boston will prevent me from being with you and your friends on the 24th.

Your friends evidently wish this journey to be both an honor and a vacation. They hav made it the honor, you must make it the vacation.

I know that your theory about that is that a vacation is a new opportunity to work. We would venture to say, Let the remainder of your work be done moderately. You hav abundantly earned a rest. Your influence and the results of your labors may be allowed to work for you, and they will never cease to work. Those whom you hav trained will work, THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers will work, and the great wave of liberty, knowledge, human love, and sympathy you hav set in motion can never recede.

For your tireless labors, your sacrifice even to the laying down of personal liberty for a time, for your steady and unfailing humor and encouragment, for your firm upholding of the banner of truth, through evil and good report, we all join in the heartiest thanks and gratitude to you.

We pledge to you in return our warmest friendship and good wishes; to your wife our kindest care and sympathy; to the cause of liberty you represent our life-long devotion and support.

May you return laden not with the spoils, but with the thoughts and experiences of many lands and climes, and liv to enjoy them with us through a long sunny afternoon of life. That is the sincere wish of your sincere friend,

T. B. WAKEMAN.

Mrs. Jennie Macdonald then sang, in the beautiful manner peculiar to herself, a favorit song. She was accompanied on the piano by Miss Annie Allen.

Mr. S. P. Putnam then gave an earnest, eloquent address of fully fifteen minutes, in which he recounted the injustice and wrong that had been done to the editor, the disgrace that had been attempted to pile upon him, but which really had redounded to his honor and fame. He bade the editor to go forth on his long journey around the planet with the full assurance that he was loved and remembered by numerous friends at home and all over the land. He said: "We send you forth, Mr. Bennett, on this mission because we wish to hav presented to us the different phases and conditions of the family of man, as he is represented by the various nations all over the globe. We know you will giv us a faithful account as you see it, and we shall read your descriptions of your journey with the deepest interest. We shall know we can rely upon your statements, and will be sure they will not be warped by theological bias or prejudice. Study up the great family of man, and tell us what is of interest to humanity in general."

The speaker alluded to the parting which took place two years ago when the editor was unjustly taken to prison, to pass a year of his life, and how different are the conditions of this present meeting; that parting was in sadness, this in joy and hope.

After his continued remarks in a similar vein, Mr. Putnam read the following original poem, written for the occasion:

Go, worthy pilgrim, with thine eye serene,
Baptized by science and made swift and keen,
To gather truth where ancient lies are strewed
Along progression's slow, far-winding road;
Go, prophet of the new, and pierce the old,
And bring to darling light the hidden gold;
From sea to sea, from varied land,
Unfold the spirit that has made them grand;
And in each fading image still unbar
What once to struggling man was hope's bright star;
Go with thy wisdom, freedom, and wide thought,
And measure whatsoe'er the past hath wrought—
What it hath builded with its ardent toil
Out of the mystic heavens and fruitful soil.
Strange scenes will mingle with thy journey vast
As the round world before thy gaze is cast;
The wondrous life of ages painted there,
Its pathos, glory, sadness, and despair.
Yes, thou shalt see the scaffold and the gloom
Of prison walls; and thou shalt pass the bloom
Of martyrs' graves, and feel their spirit proud;
And thou shalt see the altar and the crowd
Still bowing to the phantoms of the air.
With sweat and pain their burdens still they bear.
The shaven priesthood will thy pathway throng,
Weaving the charms that still protect the wrong,
And trading in the baseless faith of man,
And making all his airy dreams a ban.
Thou shalt see ignorance that licks the dust,
That builds the throne and makes the laws unjust;
Thou shalt see crime in high and vice in low,
And crouching fear and despot's pampered show.
Thou shalt see tears and strife and fields of blood,
The golden palace by the huts of mud;
Thou shalt see wealth and splendor reared on woe,
A heaven for some built on a hell below,
Where millions labor and yet daily starve,
Forging the tool whereby one man may carve
His way to opulence and purple power.
While they who made him in weak terror cower.
These thou shalt see, and still along with these,
In full surpassing ray, truth's imageries:
The poet's laurel and the artist's fire—
A thousand shapes that from the heart aspire;
The flame of nature and the breath of life,
Eternal in the bosom of the strife.
From mountain and the plain and green wild wood,
From glassy river and tumultuous flood;
From many a gleaming isle and blue serene,
And wind-touched billows with its tossing sheen,
Thou shalt catch splendid thought and passion high,
Thou shalt see all is verging to the sky;
That man's deep fate is linked with highest light,
And he will yet the golden fire make bright
Within his godlike heart and ample brain.
He yet in freedom all in all will reign.
Thou shalt return with new hope, with fresh joy;
Thy gathered wisdom, spite of pain's alloy,
Will make thee more elate, more strong, more bold.
These pictures of the past will not grow cold.
Like ancient wine, they'll giv the spirit zest,
And touch the present with the future's best.

Madame Michel then recited in almost inimitable style Charles Mackay's poem, "Eternal Justice," commencing:

That man is thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who for the advancement of his kind
Is wiser than his time.
For him the hemlock shall distill,
For him the ax is bared;
For him the gibbet shall be built,
For him the stake prepared;
Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
Pursue with deadly aim;
And malice, envy, spite, and lies
Shall desecrate his name.
But truth shall conquer at the last,
For round and round we run,
And ever right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done.

E. W. Chamberlain (attorney, of this city) delivered the following address:

Friends of the Fourth Liberal League: We hav come together this evening for the purpose of once more taking by the hand our noble friend, D. M. Bennett. We hav many times grasped his hand before, sometimes in pain and sympathy, sometimes in joy and pleasure, sometimes in adversity and defeat, and sometimes in success and triumph, but never at any time, whether in cloud or sunshine, with any other sentiments than those of respect for his noble qualities and esteem for his goodness. And now we hav reached the time when we shake hands once more, pleasurably, yet with a mingling of sadness, to bid him adieu and bon voyage.

It is perhaps not inappropriate upon this occasion to take a look around us, to recall memories of the past, and to prognosticate for the future.

It is now a little over a year since I became acquainted with Mr. Bennett. I first met him on the evening of that grand ovation following his release from prison, when a thundering protest against "corruption in office, hypocrisy in the pulpit, "and dishonesty on the 'bench,'" went up from an audience thoroughly American and thoroughly in earnest. I was at once struck with his amiable countenance, his affable manner, and his quiet demeanor, and I wondered could this be the man that malice had picked out to pour filth upon! Could this be the man who had been reviled and stigmatized and pointed out as a fiend!

"There was a manhood in his look
That murder could not kill."

And I recognized that manhood, and I knew that he was not a fiend nor an enemy of his fellows. I felt that no amount of scurrilous vituperation could make me believe that the man who spoke so learnedly and so modestly was a bad man in thought or deed. I felt that respect for him would not be misplaced, and I shook hands with the old convict, and we've been good friends ever since.

The merits of his case and the causes which led to his conviction were at that time little known. Few knew and fewer cared anything about the obscenity question. Many good and true men were content to say, If a man is publicly obscene he becomes a nuisance and deserves to be punished, and few troubled themselvs whether Mr. Bennett had really been guilty of obscenity or not, or took interest enough in the matter to ask the prior questions, how convicted? and by whom? and very few knew the trick of his conviction. That trick palmed upon the jury by Judge Benedict, before whom Comstock boasts that he never loses a case, you are familiar with. So ignorant were intelligent men upon the subject that the hall of Cooper Union was refused to the gentlemen who sought to engage it for that Sunday evening reception.

Mr. Bennett's means were limited. He was impoverished by an expensiv litigation and the derangement of business consequent upon his cruel imprisonment, and his prospects at that time were far from reassuring. But the course which these matters hav taken shows us, if we needed to be shown, that truth will prevail. The public was aroused by that reception to a suspicion of the motivs underlying that prosecution. It had yet to be educated up to a full knowledge of the infamy of Comstockism. But there were those who knew the atrocity of the outrage Mr. Bennett had suffered, and the hypocritical perversion of facts and law and justice by which that outrage had been brought about, and who pledged themselvs to "continue to do whatsoever true men and true women may rightly do to reverse this whole current of procedure."

Looking around us to-day we realize that a long stride has been taken toward the fulfilment of the prophecy made that Sunday night in his address by Mr. James D. McClelland. He said, "You hav commenced the great crusade which will end in the extirpation of such men as Comstock, and you will continue in this work until the historians shall record in our annals that a monstrosity like Comstock is an impossibility in the legal history of our country, and you, in your individual capacity, can go out to-night and from this time forward create a healthy public sentiment that will accomplish that result."

As a moral victory, the Chickering Hall meeting was of greater value than the success of the efforts to obtain President Hayes pardon ever could hav been, and to-day those patriots who are interested in this question are rejoicing in the fruits of that triumph. The friends of liberty are much indebted to Truth, a paper which appeared just when it was most wanted, and has done a splendid work, and in this connection let me not forget to return thanks to the Defense Association. Humble individuals in by-places are letting in streams of light all over the country, all tending to swell the wave of anti-Comstock sentiment and induce a purer moral tone to public thought. And recently Comstock, who, like the king, could do no wrong, has been indicted for a cowardly assault upon a woman, and only within a few days the legislature of the Empire state gave unmistakable expression of their estimate of the integrity of Comstock and his associates.

This is a retrospect of the past and a review of the year. For most of the good which Americans can realize from the check thus given to obscenity and tyranny they are indebted to our friend, Mr. Bennett. Can any language be more true and fitting than the words of T. B. Wakeman when he said, "When Bennett left his prison it was in triumph?"

And are we not encouraged to be hopeful for the future? May we not look forward to the day when blackmailing by means of the Comstock laws shall be as detestable as any other form of robbery? May we not reasonably hope for a time when trickery in the administration of justice shall be banished from the bench? And may we not in our lifetimes realize what our fathers struggled for—the fullest freedom of expression of opinion on religious, political, and secular subjects, opened to men of all shades and varieties of belief, be they Jews, Infidels, Christians, Buddhists, Mohammedans, or what not? And may we not witness the eradication of that most dangerous doctrin that this is a Christian country?

Sir (turning to Mr. Bennett), no great good comes without some pain. Yours has been the pain, and your countrymen will reap the good. For that your countrymen owe you more than they can ever repay. If the fullest measure of filth and obloquy had not been poured out of the vessels of wrath upon you, you would not now be taking leave of us for a tour of the world, such as it is the fortune of few men to enjoy. You will go "from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand," through every climate and temperature; you will see humanity working like ants in their little hills, but with much less of system, each little group striving to build up and perpetuate the peculiar notion it may hav got hold of; you will see all sorts of men and all sorts of customs and manners, and you will realize that he spoke truly who said that much of the notion of right and wrong is merely conventional, that what is right in New York is wrong in Japan, and so on round the world; you will see queer systems of jurisprudence, and noble men harrowed under them as you hav been; you will see queer religions, and you will laugh with Puck, and say, "What fools these mortals be!" you will tread historic ground and weep with Mark Twain over the grave of Adam; you will peep into the black hole of Calcutta, and perhaps you will wish you had stayed in the Albany Penitentiary all the rest of your life; you will compare other lands and other social systems with your own, and you will sing "Hail Columbia" as, a year from now, you steam up through the Golden Gate at San Francisco, and rejoice that you are an American. But wherever you may go, remember that for what you hav suffered there are true Americans now, and more will come hereafter, who will bless you as long as America has a history.

Farewell! May your path be happy, your journey prosperous, and your return joyous!

Mr. Lawrence then sang in excellent voice and style a favorit song, accompanied on the piano by E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D.

Henry A. Stone made a short speech, in which he said he had been acquainted with Mr. Bennett from early childhood and had always found him honest, earnest, and brave in the discharge of his duty and entitled to the highest respect from his fellow-men. He expected much good to result from this long journey, and felt confident a truthful report would be rendered to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He closed with the following original lines:

Friends of the true, despisers of fiction,
Gladly we greet you with welcome to-night.
Bold in defense of reason's conviction,
Strong in our hopes, independence, and right.

Heralds of joy and final deliverance,
Bearing aloft the bright beacon of light;
Gathered around, with tokens of reverence,
Our hero, who's fought for freedom and right.

Bravely he stood, and our flag has unfurled,
Wavering not when darkness enshrouded.

Now he starts out to encompass the world,
Let him go forth with friendship surrounded.

Fearless and strong, he is ripe for the contest,
Clad in the laurels so bravely he's won;
Here nor in Rome will he garble his protest
Against superstition for pope, priest, nor Hun.

Kindly we hope for his health and his pleasure,
While on his journey by sea or by land;
Guarded by love, his memory we'll treasure,
And trust in the future to again press his hand.

Dr. Joseph R. Buchanan made a neat little speech full of friendship and sympathy. He said that Mr. Bennett and himself did not agree altogether in their views, but he was sure Mr. Bennett was conscientious in the work he is doing in breaking down idols and uprooting superstitions. He had watched his course with interest for many years, and he cheerfully accorded to him the qualities of honesty and earnestness, by which he believed much good had been accomplished. His best wishes would accompany the traveler on his long journey around the world, and he would be one to gladly welcome him back again.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., upon being called upon, made a few remarks, saying he had come to listen and not to speak. He had the honor to be one of the committee to receive Mr. Bennett upon his release from prison and accompany him to his home. He had participated in the effort to giv him a fitting public welcome upon his restoration to liberty. He was glad now to be one of the number to giv him a parting good-bye when he is about to take his leave of us for a year. He was not one who was anxious for Mr. Bennett to absent himself from home to make this long journey, feeling more anxious for him to remain at his post, to do battle in the faithful manner in which he has been doing it. But he yielded to the wishes of others, and joined in wishing Mr. Bennett a prosperous voyage and a safe return.

Prof. A. L. Rawson made a speech of ten or fifteen minutes. He alluded to the fact that Mr. Bennett and himself made a journey to Europe together last year; that in Paris they together climbed the Arc de Triomphe, a grand and huge structure of masonry, on the surface of which are portrayed in the most artistic way the scenes of battles in which the French had whipped their neighbors. In Brussels another arch nearly as large was witnessed, but that was made of scantling, boards, and canvas, painted; in short, it was a sham. But as great a sham as was the arch at Brussells, that at Paris was a still greater one, because it commemorated the blood and useless wars and battles for false glory and the subjection of a portion of the human family. Not one of the scenes represented on that vast pile tended to elevate the human race, nor were the events there portrayed calculated to make the race any happier or freer, but rather to load them with chains and weigh them down with oppression. But as great as these shams are, he regarded the system of Christianity as a still greater sham. It is made up of the myths and superstitions of the past dark ages, and is not and has not been run for the good of man. He joined in wishing Mr. Bennett a safe and prosperous journey.

Madam Michel recited the poem of "John Littlejohn" in very effectiv style. As an elocutionist she has few superiors.

Mr. Lawrence sang "The Vagabonds" in a manner giving the highest satisfaction. He is a singer of unusual merit.

Mr. T. C. Leland read portions of the report he has written to be made at the International Federation or Congress of Freethinkers, to be held in London in September, and which Mr. Bennett will attend as a delegate from the Liberals of the United States. The report contains much useful information, with many gems and hits of wit and humor. In due time it will be laid before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

T. R. Kinget, M. D., made a very interesting speech of some ten minutes, well filled with expressions of friendship and sympathy to Mr. Bennett. He was much pleased to meet with the friends to do honor to a departing brother, and he wished such meetings could take place oftener and thereby renew and strengthen the fraternal and unifying feeling which ought to exist among Liberals. He saw in this assembly the faces of many whom he did not know, and this he thought not right. Liberals ought to meet often enough together to know each other well, and by communion to derive strength, encouragement, and increase the friendly, social element.

Mr. Bennett spoke for a few minutes. He said he feared he would be unable to make his friends understand how grateful he felt to those who had assembled here on this occasion to bid him farewell. He felt that every one who had gathered here had done him special honor. He had been made very happy by the kindness and friendship thus extended to him. He counted himself very fortunate in the number of warm friends he had not only in the city, but also all over this broad land; they can be numbered by hundreds and thousands. He often wondered what he had done or what deeds he had performed that should endear to him such a grand number of true, loyal friends, who not only hav bestowed upon him the kindest tokens of friendship, but hav sent him the funds to make this long journey now before him. He said the presence of this goodly number of friends here to-night, and that are all over the country, will be held in memory when he is far away on the opposit side of the globe, and if he gets weary, homesick, or troubled in any way while thousands of miles from home, he will remember the friends here assembled, and those in the east, west, north, and south. He said he should carry these friends along with him in spirit, and so far as possible make them see with his eyes and contemplate with his thoughts. He promised to use vigilance while away to make the best use of what he meets with, and to convey to his numerous friends at home as clear an account of everything as possible.

"And now," said he, "let me ask you not to forget my faithful little wife, who will remain at home to look after affairs, and who will do all she can to keep the good work moving on in the best possible way. She has stood faithfully by me when the shafts of hatred, envy, and malice hav been aimed at me, and when the darts of obloquy and slander hav fallen all around me. She proved true when others were false, and I ask you and the good friends all over the country not to forget her nor the struggle she is making for the good of the cause we all hav at heart." [Several voices were heard, "We will not forget her."]

Mr. Bennett said he also counted himself fortunate in having so genial a traveling companion as Mr. Bridges. It was much better to hav such than to peregrinate the opposit side of the globe alone, when, if anything serious should happen to one, friends here could never know anything about it; but when two are together, one can assist the other; and should anything serious occur with one, the other can convey the intelligence to friends at home.

He informed the audience that he would take with him a photograph apparatus and take views of the most interesting places on the journey, the same to be used to illustrate the volumes to be written, and for stereoptic views, to be used in illustrating his lectures after his return. He will be anxious to show his friends what he saw while circumnavigating the globe, and it would make him proud to do so with views taken by himself. He again thanked those present for their kindly greetings and fraternal regards.

Other songs were sung by Mrs. Macdonald and Mr. Lawrence. Miss Allen favored the audience with music on the piano.

Mr. Bridges was called upon, when he arose and made a few remarks, which afforded an opportunity for those present to see him.

Two collations of cake and wine were served to those who wished such refreshments, and at twelve o'clock the last of the audience took their leave, all feeling that they had passed a very pleasant evening.

Too much praise cannot be accorded to Mr. and Mrs. Ryan for their kindness upon the occasion, and for their very friendly reception of all present.

Many of those present expressed their determination to visit the steamer Ethiopia, of the Anchor line, which sails at 8 o'clock Saturday morning, the 30th, from the foot of Dey sreet, and see Mr. Bennett off.

The Pyramid of Gizeh.

THE RELATION OF ANCIENT EGYPTIAN CIVILIZATION TO THE HEBREW NARRATIVS IN GENESIS AND EXODUS, AND THE RELATIV CLAIMS OF MOSES AND THE PYRAMID TO INSPIRATION CONSIDERED.

BY PROF. VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

Three schools of eminent, learned, and unsuccessful investigators of Egyptology hav sought to solve the problems, Who built the great pyramid of Gizeh, and when and for what purpose did they build it? Does it represent the civilization of the ancient Egyptians within the historic period? Or is it the product of some more highly cultured people, or more scientific inspiration than they possessed? How do the relics in stone, the writings upon papyrus, and the other evidences of this ancient Egyptian civilization accord with the explorations which, during the last half century, hav gone on so activly in Aryan literature, and which tend to place the cradle of civilization eastward on the plateaus of Asia? Was the civilization of Egypt an offshoot of the Asiatic or an independent evolution? Is it more ancient than the Asiatic, or does it follow? Do its records and monuments aid in confirming as true history the books of Moses, or do they tend to aid the work, now so rapidly advancing among philologists, of resolving the supposed Hebrew histories of earliest dates into a chain of mythical narrations, having their origin in astrology and poetry, like the myths of the Aryan races? These are the questions which agitate the three schools of the Egyptologists, whom I shall call the astronomico-geometrical, the hieroglyphic, and the Hebraic-Christian schools. Each of these schools has been characteristically silent concerning the researches of the others. Facts and speculations on which Piazzi Smyth, of the astronomical school, has expended five bulky volumes are ignored by Dr. Brugsch Bey, of the hieroglyphic school, in his two-volume work, and on the other hand Bunsen's conclusions are seldom mentioned except as targets by the astronomers.

The astronomico-geometrical school hav proceeded by measuring the pyramid at various points, and applying this measurement to almost every other conceivable distance in the solar system, to the earth's radius, to the distance on the earth from the equator to the poles at Cairo, to the distance from the earth to the sun, and they hav squared and cubed these measurements and compared them with the acre and the foot, the caldron and the bushel, and out of the dimensions in inches of certain parts of the pyramid they hav inferred that its builders knew of the great year of the Pleiades, 25,867 years in which the precession of the equinox is accomplished, and that all modern measures of distance, bulk, area, and time are but degenerations from the perfectness of that system of metrology which they say was known to the builders of the pyramids, but had been lost even to the Egyptians before the historic period began. The more solid but not always trustworthy men of the astronomical school are Sir Isaac Newton, who wrote before the criticisms on the Old Testament had dissolved its claim to inspiration in scientific matters, the Herschells, and Piazzi Smith. The latter spent many months at the pyramid, and while his inferences are among the most romantic, his measurements are certainly the most trustworthy we hav. He thinks the pyramid was built by an inspired Chaldean—a theory which saves the merit of the work to the white race. This school generally hold that the pyramid was built and sealed up to preserve from mankind the knowledge of certain standards of measure and other scientific facts of great value.

The second school is the hieroglyphic school, the readers of the monumental inscriptions, the papyri, the priestly literature, the "book of the dead," concerning which Bunsen, the best of them all, said that no man living could read a whole sentence correctly. Several learned pundits died claiming to hav discovered the clue to the correct reading of the hieroglyphic language, without any subsequent scholar having administered on their estates. More recently, however, by the discovery of some tablets at Rosetta, in which the hieroglyphic lines are interspersed with Greek lines translating them, there is a general consensus of the initiated to the proposition that by the help of liberal guess-work, and keeping all the guessers together, and allowing every sound, idea, or object to be represented in so many ways that each man may guess it out to suit himself, certain translations can be made of Egyptian literature which will prove the Egyptians to hav been as nearly idiotic as an intelligent race could well become. There is great force in the remark, never before made, that so far from the Egyptian hieroglyphics being meaningless, they hav three meanings; one which the Egyptians understood and we do not. This is the most important one. One which we understand and the Egyptians did not. This is the most accessible one to us, and the third is one which neither they or we hav ever understood. Herein lies the future hope of Egyptology. This school is led by Bunsen, Champollion, Dr. Brugsch Bey, Williamson, and Renouf. It holds that the pyramid was built simply as the sepulcher of a king who was never buried there.

The third school is that of the Hebrew-Christian, who hav rummaged Egypt in every crack and cranny to find in Egyptian literature some confirmation of the stories told by the author of the books of Moses (so called), and who, not finding any, hav taken to dressing up certain nativ Egyptians and Assyrians in Jewish clothing, and asserting with all their might that these are the Jews of Genesis and Exodus.

Each of these schools, therefore, has its bias and its incubus. The bias of the astronomical school is that human vanity is tickled by originating eccentric and marvelous theories, which, like the lightning, dazzle if they do not instruct. Its incubus is that at the utmost its method is limited to the proof of a coincidence, and the proof of mere coincidence never becomes proof of a cause. In many cases the measurements hav been strained or mistaken to create the coincidence. The bias of the hieroglyphic school is that no man ever obtains fame as a hieroglyphist by not being able to read the hieroglyphics, any more than one can acquire fame as an astrologist by denying that the future can be read from the stars. The world's order to the hieroglyphist is "translate something"—correctly if you can, but translate it anyway. The incubus of the hieroglyphic school lies in the fact that while the authors of these hieroglyphics probably knew what they were talking about they did not succeed in making themselvs very clear to the modern mind. This is precisely the reverse of the difficulty under which the Hebrew writers labored, which was that while their writings are so clear that he who runs may read, no such Egyptian facts as their authors wrote about seem to hav ever had any place in history—at least among the Egyptians.

It is using mild phrase to say that each of the schools of Egyptologists has done a great deal of romancing. Take a sample from the astronomical school. Though Newton, Herschell, and Smyth hav lent dignity to the astronomical phase of the discussion, the most vigorous arithmetical and geometrical lunatic who has ever scattered his wits on this question is a Mr. John Taylor, who also discovered the notion that Philip Francis wrote the letters of Junius. Taylor, more than any other, invented the theory that the pyramid was erected to eternize certain measures of distance, weight, time, and bulk. Here is one of his sentences sufficient of itself to indicate that no lack of facts could ever embarrass a mind like his in the invention of theories:

"When the new earth was measured in Egypt after the deluge, it was found that it exceeded the diameter of the old earth by the difference between 497,664,000 inches and 500,000,000 inches; that is, by 2,336,000 inches, equal to 36,869 miles; and this increase was the reason why the former number of 5,760 inches (in the second) was enlarged to 5,787,446." He then goes on to explain the increase in the earth's diameter at the deluge by assuming that certain waters which were above the firmament, in some such manner as Saturn's rings are above that planet, broke through the firmament and came to the earth, thus causing both the deluge and the simultaneous increase in the earth's diameter. Another specimen of romancing is the interpretation given to the statement made by the Egyptians of the cost expended by the builder of the pyramid upon radishes, garlic, and onions for the workmen engaged in its erection, by saying that in the hieroglyphic language, radishes, garlic, and onions were the signs invented by the the Egyptians, and still used to express degrees, minutes, and seconds, and that the meaning mystically conveyed was that the builder of the pyramid had gone to this great expense to get his angles of information right. No translation of the hieroglyphic language confirms this ingenious hypothesis.

Mr. Syse, of Philadelphia, a Lutheran minister, illustrates the romancing tendencies of the Christian school of Egyptologists. He wrote to prove that the pyramid is a prophecy of Christianity, and if we would put any trust in his inferences he would convince us that its builders knew more about Judaism, Christianity, and the end of the world than any Hebrew prophet. He maps out the principal passages of the pyramid in a manner to exhibit the closest correspondence between the number of inches in certain passageways and the number of years in corresponding epochs of alleged or actual history, not of the Egyptians at all, but of the Jews and Christians, including, I believe, the periods from the flood to the call of Abraham, from thence to the building of the temple or the coming of Christ, and from thence to the year 1876, in which he wrote, at which period his figures indicated some general collapse of nature to be about due. Such writers are not worthy of quotation. It is sufficient to indicate fairly the tone of their idiocy. Alas! the pyramid is neither in its structure, nor by the voice of tradition, in the least designed to promote superstitions of any kind. In no part of the structure is a god of any kind or name recognized any more than in the Constitution of the United States or in the overflow of the Nile. Tradition teaches that its builders were the enemies of the Egyptian faith, and were principally engaged in destroying its temples and ill-treating its priests. The pyramid contains not a religious sign or emblem from socket to capstone. Religion, like the small-pox, can seldom be taken a second time. Men who had so far recovered from an attack of their own national faith as to expend twenty-five years in building a structure which should studiously avoid recognizing it in any manner would be very unlikely to tax the utmost energies of a nation of ten millions of people for twenty-five years to help out the prophecies of an alien religion of a weak, nomadic tribe, which, if they had ever heard of, they despised.

An equally absurd hypothesis on the part of the hieroglyphic school is the speculation of Osborne in "Monumental Egypt," to the effect that the Ra Athamah worshiped by the Egyptians in the delta as the sun-god was the Hebrew Adam, converted into a god after his death, and that the Egyptian god Nu, or "god of the floods," was the Hebrew Noah apotheosized. As well suppose that the French of to-day derive their fashions from the Modocs, as that the Egyptians derived their theology from the Hebrews, when the Egyptian language, mythology, and monarchy were all in a state of decline before the Hebrews began writing their inspired novels.

The Egyptians picture themselvs, in their numerous colored reliefs and tablets, as a red race, Roman nosed, broad-shouldered, nervous temperament, despotic, determined, activ, lithe, grave as an American Indian, silent, and severe. Where either whites or blacks appear in their tablets, they appear as slaves and aliens. Women and children were under the abject despotism of their male superiors, as is indicated by tablets of royal families, in which the wife hangs on the king's arm like an extra garment, her head reaching only up to his waist, and the other members of the family, though of matured forms, reached only to his knees. Despotic subordination of inferiors to superiors was therefore the prime fact of Egyptian civilization, as equality and insubordination are of American.

Perhaps the truest type of the civilization of any period is that mode of development which best fits it to survive amidst its actual conditions. The ape has its civilization, and prior to the discovery of all the arts, including weapons, cooking, and apparel, the ape is more fitted to survive than the Australian or the negro. His civilization stands arrested at just the point where he begins to use the club as a weapon. The negro's civilization is better adapted than that of the yellow race to a condition that is without letters, metals, clothing, or commerce. It is easier for him to be happy without all these, and just at the point where he can be happy without further progress his civilization culminates and is arrested. Above the negro race by a long stride, but below the Chinese, come the red race of ancient Egypt, and possibly also of Phœnicia, as the latter name signifies red. The colored reliefs and tablets he has left behind giv him the form and features above indicated: the lips are thin, the eye cold and haughty, the turn of the head is grave, for their kings look on at their dancers in stony, pleasureless pride, and their husbands do not bend in tenderness over their wives like Hector saluting Andromache. Such seems to hav been the race that hurled itself against the quarries of Egypt and Arabia in the determination to be eternal in its works of art. The Chinese hav saved their race by subordinating art to human welfare. They build no better than they need. The Egyptians sacrificed human welfare to art; man to his works; they cared not whether nerve or muscle or life or affection endured, or even whether the race itself disappeared, so that its pyramids, empire, power, temples, monoliths, and monuments might liv on. Only a stern-willed race of intellectual despots could hav manifested this ambition. It is akin to the Greek artist's torture of his slave, in order that he might liv in fame eternally by arresting and putting on the canvas, as nearly as he might, the Scythian's dying groan. It is the Napoleonic sacrifice of an army to win a battle. It was the spirit that has made Greece great in art, Rome in law, England in commerce, and America in industry.

While Egypt nominally covers about four times the area of Illinois, viz., 216,000 square miles, all except the narrow valley of the Nile is desert. This diminutiv space is only from seven miles wide to twelve in its widest part, and about six hundred miles long, thus embracing only 6,600 square miles, or about one-eighth the area of Illinois. Along this valley are strewn some seventy pyramids, and the remains of many miles of temples, indicating the ancient residence there of a people not often estimated at more than 8,000,000, but whom one enthusiastic writer declares to hav had 26,000 cities. Many of these remains are so vast that systematic and formidable labor would be required to destroy or seriously impair them.

The tourist of to-day moves among the pillars of the temple of Carnac, sixty feet high and thirty feet in circumference, yet rising on either hand through long corridors of columns as if they were but sap-plings growing in the nurseries of the gods, and leaves them with the mental query, What motiv ever induced this mighty race to sacrifice its nerve and muscle, blood and life, so prodigally, so wastefully, upon these altars of stone?

When St. Peter's, at Rome, shall hav crumbled to dust, when Macaulay's New Zealander shall hav climbed up the archless turrets of London bridge to sketch the moldering ruins of St. Paul's, when men shall look on ancient maps for the outlines of what was once the American republic, supposing this republic to endure like that of Rome, for thirteen centuries, even then the sphinx will look out in stony mystery upon the Lybian desert, and the tourist will find the pyramids as difficult a riddle as they are to-day, but essentially as perfect in their preservation.

Among all these monuments the largest seems to possess qualities of intellectuality and suggestions not shared by any other structure on earth. It is deemed the oldest structure in the world, the great Gizeh pyramid, called of Cheops, Chufu, or Suphis, or the "great pyramid." Of manifest obvious inscriptions, designed to convey the meaning of the monument to the mind of posterity, there is not a line in the whole pyramid. In view of the fact that all the later Egyptian temples and monuments glitter all over with these inscriptions, so that they become an inseparable element of Egyptian architecture, Prof. Piazzi Smyth infers that the pyramid of Gizeh, if built by Egyptians at all, was directed as to its architecture by divinely inspired men from Chaldea. Whether the outer stone casing of the pyramid ever contained inscriptions cannot now be known. It has undergone destruction and removal at the hands of Mamelukes and Arabs, between the period of Herodotus and the time when it began to attract the attention of modern Europeans. The interior contains no hieroglyphs except a few rude stone-dressers' marks in ocher, purporting to be the name of Kuphis, Shufu, Cheops, Chemmis, or Suphis, which are found in one of the construction chambers, and whose purpose is said to be that of indicating the position in which the stone should be laid. Like marks are said to be still extant in some of the Arabian quarries from which the stone used in the finer work of the chambers and passages was taken.

This has caused the hieroglyphic school to assume very generally that the pyramid was built in the reign of Kuphis, to which they attempt to assign a date out of the materials furnished by the labyrinthian maze of Egyptian chronology. It certainly proves that, if correctly deciphered by the translators, in his reign all the passageways leading to the obscure construction chambers were still open. If we had the least evidence that the stone-masons of Egypt had a custom of using the names of their sovereigns as quarry-marks to indicate how a stone should be laid, which would seem to be a most unique and improbable custom, it would furnish a presumption that the pyramid was built in his reign. It is carrying presumption a great way to assume that they preserve truly a fact which the builders of the pyramid seem to hav desired only to conceal.

But Newton, the Herschells, and Smyth concur in ascribing to the builders of this structure an intellectuality and a knowledge of metrology of the existence of which, during the historic period among the ancient Egyptians, neither they nor the hieroglyphists find any evidence whatever. Indeed, if the astronomical school are right, the pyramid builders must hav had a scientific knowledge which, within the historic period, never came into the possession of mankind at all until during the past two hundred years.

The chief of Egyptologists, Baron Bunsen, in his edition of 1860, referring to these views of Newton and Herschell, then recently revived by the explorations and measurements of Col. Sir Howard Vyse in 1854, says, "The groundlessness of the fancies which hav been again very recently indulged in about the astronomical purposes of the pyramids, and about a hidden symbolic system of astronomy, is demonstrated by that thorough conviction which is forced upon us by a view of the monuments and a reading of the hieroglyphics."

This sententious opinion becomes very refreshing when we reflect that in the great pyramids there are no hieroglyphics, and that Bunsen never viewed either of the pyramids or the monuments. The purposes of the pyramids cannot be determined from a view of any monuments built after them, for if built after them at all, they may hav been built a thousand years after. And if by these monuments Bunsen meant the pyramids themselvs, then Bunsen, who was never in Egypt nor ever saw the pyramids, had merely the intellectual view of them which Newton and Herschell had. The encyclopedias, British and American, hav followed Bunsen's estimate, hav described the great pyramid as merely the mausoleum of a dead Pharaoh, and hav assigned its erection to the reign of Cheops, Chufu, Chemmis, Shufu, or Suphis, as he is variously called by translators.

The great pyramid is now 450 feet and nine inches high, according to Prof. Piazzi Smith, whose measurements are confessedly the best. A few stones of the original exterior casing of the base of the pyramid hav been found in place and perfect. From these it is known that through the vandalism of the Turks and Arabs in carrying away the outer stones of the pyramid as building material for Cairo and other cities the pyramid has lost exactly thirty feet of its original hight, which was 480 feet and nine inches. This about equals the greatest hight of the Palisades along the Hudson, or three and a half times the hight of the Chicago water tower, or about one hundred feet higher than the dome of the state-house at Springfield, or two hundred feet higher than the dome of the capitol at Washington. The pyramid covers thirteen acres, the capitol at Washington three and one-half acres. All around the sides of the pyramid from ten to twenty-three feet of stone hav been removed. Its original base was 764 feet long. Its present base is 746 feet.

It is located on the left or west side of the Nile at a distance of several miles from the river's bank, on the brow of the range of hills which terminate the valley of the Nile, so that it looks out to the eastward over the valley, with the two little modern hamlets of Gizeh and Babylon near by, the city of Cairo beyond, and in the eastern horizon skirting the hills on the opposit side of the valley the ruins of Heliopolis. To the west it looks out upon the Lybian desert stretching out in unending wastes to the Atlantic. Its base is 137 feet above the highest flood point of the Nile, and so near where the river divides to form the delta that the circumference of the delta forms an arc of a circle of which the pyramid would be the center.

The location of the great pyramid is as follows:

1. It is sensibly, but only apparently, on the thirtieth parallel of north latitude, one-third the distance from the equator to the pole. In reality its exact latitude, computed with the accuracy with which modern astronomers are able to allow for the refraction of light, is 29°, 58′, and 52″, or a mile and a fifth, south of the exact thirtieth degree. But Prof. Smyth says that owing to the refraction of the rays of light in passing through our atmosphere the apparent pole to the eye of one standing at the pyramid would vary only 21″ from the exact altitude of thirty degrees; i. e., if there were a star exactly at the pole, a person standing exactly thirty degrees north of the equator, on the earth, would see that star at a point within twenty-one seconds of an altitude of thirty degrees from the horizon. To the eye of a pyramid-builder not acquainted with the law of the refraction of light, the pyramid, therefore, is only twenty-one seconds from the exact latitude of thirty degrees, or, say, one-fifth of a mile. To get nearer than this to the thirtieth parallel would hav required that its builders should descend from the commanding hill of solid limestone, which formed so requisit a foundation, into an alluvial plain of sand where the dignity of the structure would hav been lost. As nearly as the lay of the ground rendered possible, the great pyramid is one-third the distance from the equator to the pole, and therefore it would, if the earth were an exact sphere, divide the area of the northern hemisphere into two exactly equal parts. But the earth being an oblate spheriod flattened at the poles, the line of equal division of the northern hemisphere falls slightly south of the thirtieth parallel, or more nearly where the great pyramid actually stands. Our first proposition, therefore, is that this pyramid stands sensibly on the thirtieth parallel at the point where the pole star, if there were one, would be one-third the way from the horizon toward the zenith. It therefore divides the area of the northern hemisphere into two equal parts.

2. This pyramid was at its construction an exact square, the more accurate measurements having reduced the variation in its sides to two and one-half inches, with the prospect that measurements absolutely perfect would remove even this difference. Its builders, to prevent the exact dimensions of this square being lost, hewed out the sockets in which the corner-stones of the pyramid were to rest from the solid rock of the hill beneath, and set the corner-stones deeply into these sockets, where, despite the vandalism which has robbed the pyramid of it outer casing for many feet, its original base stands nearly unaffected by time, and astronomers learn with surprise and delight that its orientation, or the precision with which it faces north, south, east, and west, is so perfect that the variation is less than that of the observatory of one of Europe's most skilful astronomers prior to Newton—Tycho Brahe.

3. The angle of inclination of the sides of this pyramid is 51 degrees 51 minutes and 14.3 seconds. This is frequently said to be exactly that angle which makes the original hight of the pyramid, 5,820 inches, bear the same relation to the added length of its four sides (4x9, 142), viz., 36,568 inches, as the radius of a circle bears to its circumference. But in reality the angle required for this purpose varies a few seconds from that actually presented by the pyramid. We assume the variation to be so slight as not to interfere with the design. This is what is called an incommensurable ratio in mathematics—i. e., no mathematician can construct a unit of measurement, whether it be as narrow as a hair or as broad as a barn-door, which, if it will go an even number of times into one of these dimensions, will also go an even number of times into the other. Any inch, or foot, or cubic rule, which, when applied to the radius of a circle, will go an even number of times, will, when applied to its circumference, leave a fraction over. This ratio is expressed in decimals by saying that the diameter or double radius of a circle is to its circumference as 1 is to 3.14159—i. e., the fraction runs out indefinitely without repeating consecutivly the same figure or combinations of figures. Now, doubling the hight of the pyramid, it becomes 11,640 inches, which bears the ratio to its circumference of 1 to 3 14159, which is, palpably and certainly, and, by necessity, intentionally, this very ratio, which is nothing less than the very keystone in the arch of mathematical science.

For herein the great pyramid presents, in its two chief dimensions, the ratio of its hight to its base, that eternally insoluble problem of mathematics, the quadrature or squaring of the circle, upon which geometricians were working for two thousand years, until, as recently as 1775, the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and, shortly after, the Royal Society, of London, gave notice that they would decline to receive or examin any further papers involving either the quadrature of the circle, the tri-section of a angle, the duplication of a cube, or perpetual motion.

Archimedes, by surrounding his circle with two polygons, one outside and one inside the circle, each polygon having 96 sides, and then cutting up his polygon into triangles and computing the area of these triangles, and then striking a mean between the length of the exterior sides of the polygon inside and that of the polygon outside the circle, came to the conclusion that the diameter bore to the circumference of a circle a ratio between that of 1 to 3 10-71, and that of 1 to 3 10-72, or as 7 is to 22. But this was farther from the truth than the Hindoos had come at a period centuries earlier, for they computed it to be as 1 to 3.1416. Ptolemy, an astrologer of about the time of Christ, computed it as 1 to 3.141552, which is better than Archimedes, but less accurate than the Hindoos. One Dutch mathematician, Van Ceulen, carried out the decimal fraction to thirty-six figures, which now stand graven on his tombstone. In 1846 it had been computed to the two-hundredth decimal. Men had given their lives to its solution, as other enthusiasts had given theirs to the finding of the philosopher's stone, which should transmute the baser metals into gold, in which even Newton believed, or to the kindred problem of perpetual motion, or to the discovery of the elixir which should make man immortal, or to the redemption of the human race from sin. Is it then, as Baron Bunsen asserts, merely an accident of the early Egyptian stone-cutters that in constructing a monument for a king who had never heard of the problem of squaring the circle they should so construct it that forty centuries of mathematicians should cipher themselvs into their graves in the hopeless endeavor to solve a problem the complete insolubility of which is presumed to hav been known to the builders of this pyramid? But was the problem known to them?

Three facts suggest that, notwithstanding the pyramid seems to possess these peculiar proportions, we need not necessarily infer all that the astronomers hav inferred from it. These are: First, that the angle of the pyramid is by many stated to be 51 degrees 50 minutes instead of 51 degrees 51 minutes 14.3 seconds, thus lacking one minute 14.3 seconds of the angle which is claimed to justify the inference that its builders designed to express this problem. Second, the angle of the second and third pyramids is so nearly the same as that of Gizeh, lacking only a degree or so, as to show similarity of design, and yet not near enough to make them set forth any such fact as the quadrature of the circle. Third, it is a much simpler fact than that of the quadrature of the circle that the square of the hight of this pyramid is equal to the area of each of the four triangles composing its sides. This fact concerning the pyramids was told to Herodotus, who was not informed of the other, and its builders may hav been aiming simply to construct such an edifice that the square of its hight should equal the area of each of its four triangular sides. For this purpose the exact angle should be 51 degrees 49 minutes 46 seconds, but it is surprisingly near to that angle.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

THE present antagonism between theology and science does not arise from any assumption by the men of science that all theology must necessarily be excluded from science; but simply because they are unable to allow that reason and morality hav two weights and two measures; and that the belief in a proposition, because authority tells you it is true, or because you wish to believe it, which is a high crime and misdemeanor when the subject matter of reasoning is of one kind, becomes, under the alias of faith, the greatest of all virtues, where the subject matter of reasoning is of another kind.—Huxley.

Discussion.

Our Twenty-fourth Letter to Mr. Mair.

THE BIBLE AND OTHER TOPICS.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: In connection with the brief examination of the prophecies, introduced by you, would properly come an examination of the Bible generally, as was originally designed for this discussion; but as we have already gone over a good deal of ground, as what we have said occupies quite as much space as originally intended, and as I am on the eve of my departure on a tour around the world, I must leave unsaid much that I wished to say. I had it in mind to take up the books of the Old and New Testaments, to show to our readers that but a small proportion of the books in either part of the Bible was written by the persons to whom they are attributed; that they were not written at the time they are claimed to have been written; that it is not known by whom they were written, nor the time when they were written, giving incontestable proofs to sustain these positions. I intended to show that there is nothing about the books that is superhuman, nothing but what men of fair intellectual ability could easily write; that the books contain much that exhibits ignorance and want of scientific knowledge on the part of the writers; much that is untrue; much that is coarse and distasteful; that there are fully two hundred clear and positive contradictions; more than five hundred statements of improbabilities and impossibilities which are palmed off as facts of actual occurrence; that the writers of the greater share of the books do not even set up the pretense that they wrote by divine aid, or by any aid save their own ability, and that if they did claim it, it could not reasonably be allowed; and that though there is fine ancient poetry in the volume, and many grand expressions and beautiful sentiments, they are not superior to what is derived from other sources; while its incongruities, its discrepancies, its want of authenticity, its doubtfulness, its contradictions, its absurdities, its falsehoods, its coarseness and indecency, its incoherence, one part with another, its great want of reliability as being of celestial origin, all conspire to establish the truth that it was written, printed, and made by men, the same as all other books, and that the God of infinite wisdom, truth, and intelligence had no more to do with its authorship than with the millions of other books that have been written and printed. But for the reasons given I will not enter into the examination of these subjects now. I will remark, however, in passing, that I engaged somewhat in this examination in the article on "The Bible," in Volume I. of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," and in the "Semitic Gods and the Bible," to which the reader is referred.

I fully agree with Col. Ingersoll when he says that it is needless to inquire into the causes that have led so many to accept the Bible as the inspired word of God. They have assuredly been governed by a mistaken idea, and this mistake has in many ways seriously impeded the civilization and happiness of mankind. He says: "The Bible has been the fortress and defense of nearly every crime. No civilized country could enact its laws, and in many respects its moral code is abhorrent to every good and tender man. It is admitted that many of its precepts are pure, that many of its laws are wise and just, and that many of its statements are absolutely true.

"Without desiring to hurt the feelings of anybody, I propose to give a few reasons for thinking that a few passages, at least, in the Old Testament are the product of a barbarous people. In all civilized countries it is not only admitted, but it is passionately asserted, that slavery is and always was a hideous crime; that a war of conquest is simply murder; that polygamy is the enslavement of woman, the degradation of man, and the destruction of home; that nothing is more infamous than the slaughter of decrepit men, of helpless women, and of prattling babes; that captured maidens should not be given to soldiers; that wives should not be stoned to death on account of their religious opinions, and that the death penalty should not be inflicted for a violation of the Sabbath. We know that there was a time in the history of almost every nation when slavery, polygamy, and wars of extermination were regarded as divine institutions; when women were looked upon as beasts of burden, and when, among some people, it was considered the duty of the husband to murder his wife for differing with him on the subject of religion. Nations that entertain these views are regarded as savages, and probably, with the exception of the South Sea Islanders, the Fijis, some citizens of Delaware, and a few tribes in Central Africa, no human beings can be found degraded enough to agree upon these subjects with the Jehovah of the ancient Jews. The only evidence we have or can have that a nation has ceased to be savage is the fact that it has abandoned these doctrines. To every one, except the theologian, it is perfectly easy to account for the mistakes, atrocities, and crimes of the past by saying that civilization is a slow and painful growth; that the moral perceptions are cultivated through ages of tyranny, of want, of crime, and of heroism; that it requires centuries for man to put out the eyes of self, and hold in lofty and equal poise the scales of justice; that conscience is born of suffering; that mercy is the child of the imagination—of the power to put one's self in the sufferer's place, and that man advances only as he becomes acquainted with his surroundings, with the mutual obligations of life, and has to take advantage of the forces of nature.

"But the believer in the inspiration of the Bible is compelled to declare that there was a time when slavery was right, when men could buy and women could sell their babes. He is compelled to insist that there was a time when polygamy was the highest form of virtue; when wars and extermination were waged with the sword of mercy; when religious toleration was a crime, and when death was a just penalty for having expressed an honest thought. He must maintain that Jehovah is just as bad now as he was four thousand years ago, or that he was just as good then as he is now, and that human conditions have so changed that slavery, polygamy, religious persecutions, and wars of conquest are now perfectly devilish. Once they were right, once they were commanded by God himself, now they are prohibited. There has been such a change in the conditions of man that, at the present time, the devil is in favor of slavery, polygamy, religious persecutions, and wars of conquest. That is to say, the devil entertains the same opinion to-day that Jehovah held four thousand years ago, but in the mean time Jehovah has remained exactly the same—changeless and incapable of change. We find that other nations beside the Jews had similar laws and ideas; that they believed in and practiced slavery and polygamy, murdered women and children, and exterminated their neighbors to the extent of their power. It is not claimed thas they received a revelation. It is admitted that they had no knowledge of the true God. And yet, by a strange coincidence, they practiced the same crimes of their own nation that the Jews did by the command of Jehovah. From this it would seem that man can do wrong without a special revelation" ("Christian Religion," in North American Review).

Little is left for me to do save to examine the remaining points you touched upon in your last letter.

You seem troubled at the want of system among Infidels and their dissimilar styles of argument. It is not strange that a considerable number of men living in different centuries, reared under dissimilar conditions, impressed from different sources, moved by various impulses, possessed of different order of talent, dissimilar advantages of education, with different purposes, should not all travel in precisely the same groove, or entertain precisely the same views. While they all were able to see the falsity of the system held up as divine, it could not reasonably be expected that they would all express themselves in precisely the same way, or that the same impressions would be entertained by all. I think you cannot claim more unity of action and opinion among believers than unbelievers. The believers in Christianity comprise a great number of sects, widely divergent in their views and in their interpretation of the scriptures. They have contended with each other in the fiercest manner about these differences of opinion. Blood in great quantities has flowed from this cause. Instruments of pain have been largely used by Christians, and shrieks and groans have filled the earth. Millions of lives have been taken by Christians because others dared to entertain opinions different from their own. You cannot truly state any such thing with regard to Infidels. Consequently Christians have been much worse than Infidels. If Christianity has more "system" than have the unbelievers in it, it is a far worse system.

You certainly do great injustice to the opponents of Christianity by imputing to them "hatred of the Bible," "dishonesty," "want of principle," "inconsistency," "quibbling," "falsehood," "caricature," "ridicule," "flippancy," "degradation," "debasement," "misquoting," etc., etc. These are serious charges, and they are untrue, they are false; the opponents of Christianity are fallible human beings, and doubtless many of them are not beyond making mistakes, but they are generally honest, candid, sincere, earnest, and as moral and upright as the same number comprising the general community. The Bible is not hated only as it is falsely represented, and for the many false claims made respecting it, with the requirement that we must believe it or be utterly tabooed and ostracized in this life and be eternally damned in a future life. If the Bible be allowed to stand upon its own merits, and is only claimed to be an antique work of the Jews, with the same authority as the Vedas, the Zend Avesta, the Puranas, etc., no unbeliever would object to it at all. But it is the coercion used over us that we must accept it as the infallible work of an infinite God that stirs up our opposition. In sustaining our honest convictions we make use of arguments that to our views possess strength and truth. We quote correctly, and despise evasion and misrepresentation. If caricature and ridicule have sometimes been used, there is no impropriety in it, inasmuch as the absurdities treated are fit subjects for ridicule. A system that cannot withstand the shafts of ridicule without injury is weak indeed.

But what are the facts with regard to the status of unbelievers in Christianity? They are on the unpopular side; they oppose current errors; they are the tabooed class, they are ostracized among their fellows, they defend what they believe to be right, and oppose what they believe to be wrong, though they know they will lose caste and respect thereby; they strike against evils in high places because they find those evils in existence; they dare to occupy the ground of truth though they lose friends and fortune thereby. If they are not without fault, they are at least endeavoring to do their duty according to the best knowledge they have, hoping that the future will be freer and better for their efforts.

Certainly no defense is needed from me for the aspersions you attempt to cast upon Greg, Huxley, and the prominent scientists of our times. They stand too high in the estimation of their fellow-men to be injured by you. If the bulk of Christian writers and partisans had lived as pure lives as they, and labored as usefully and unselfishly, well would it be for the world.

You deplore the practical points of the gospel of Infidelity, and seem to see in the near future a terrible conditon of things—universal lawlessness and social chaos. "Socialism, Communism, Nihilism—the three fatal sisters—on the one hand, and freedom in the most licentious and unrestrained sense on the other, will most assuredly join together to hurry men to barbarism." Here you are guilty of slander and misrepresentaion. The Infidels of the past two hundred years have lived as honorably, have led as faultless lives, as the best of their opponents. The Nihilists or Socialists are opposed to the despots and tyrants of the race, and if they have in the natural reaction of things been guilty of some excesses, their main effort has been to improve the condition of oppressed humanity. Nihilists are said to be composed of people of excellent intelligence and civil deportment; but they love liberty and hate despotism. This is their crime. They believe in self-government and the overthrow of imperialism, and for this they are hunted to death, or sent to the terrible mines of Siberia by Christian tyrants. Christianity has been on the side of the despot, the oppressor. "Submit yourselves to the powers that be," is the injunction of Christianity. I am far more in favor of the efforts of the Nihilists than the continuance forever of the crushing despotism which Christianity has sustained.

Of course you must indulge in a fling at Freelovers; here is an enemy worthy of your steel. But where does the most practical Freelove exist to-day? Where is the most corrupt intercourse between the sexes? It is in the church, and the shepherds themselves very often lead the ewe lambs astray. I have myself collected the authenticated accounts of three hundred clergymen who disgraced themselves by their libidinous and amorous practices. These are published in the pamphlet, "Sinful Saints." Mr. M. E. Billings, an attorney, of Waverly, Iowa, has just brought out a pamphlet called, "The Crimes of Preachers in the United States," for the last five years, from May 1876 to May 1881, "translated out of the original newspapers, and with previous translations diligently compared and revised." He gives the names of the criminal clergymen, their residence, the denomination to which they belong, so far as known, and the crime they committed. In the aggregate he reports 917 crimes of clergymen in the short space of five years.

Abortion, 4; adultery, 206; assault with attempt to murder, 8; assault with attempt to do great bodily harm, 1; assault with attempt at rape, 1; assault and battery, 10; attempted elopement with women, 1; attempt to seduce women, 3; attempted bigamy, 5; arson, in burning houses, 4; bastardy, 23; wife-beating, 10; bigamy, 28; breach of promise, 2; buggery, 3; breach of hospitality, 5; breach of trust, 2; compounding felony, 3; cheating, 25; deserting wife and children, 26; dishonesty, 1; deceit, 5; died in a brothel, 1; drunkenness, 29; elopement with women, 17; embezzlement, 26; false personation, 7; falsehood, 3; fighting, 7; forging, 22; fornication, 7; gambling, 2; gross fraud, 4; gross immorality, 3; horse-racing, 1; illicit distilling, 2; illegal marrying, 2; immoral conduct, 5; indecent familiarities with women, 3; inhuman cruelty to wife and children, 17; immoral assault on women and girls, 29; insulting ladies, 26; incest, 8; kissing servant girls for their spiritual welfare, 2; keeping gambling-houses, 1; lascivious conduct, 1; larceny, 31; lewdness, 1; lechery, 1; lying, 11; miscegenation with colored women, 1; murder, 14; obscene literature (mailing), 1; obtaining money under false pretenses, 10; perjury, 7; poisoning starving children, 1; quarreling, 7; robbing, 2; rape on women, 5; rape on girls under fifteen years of age, 6; rape on girls under twelve years of age, total rape, 18; riot, 1; robbing mails, 1; "recklessness," 1; "resigned under charges, least said the better," 1; swindling, 24; seduction of women, 91; seduction of girls under fifteen years of age, 12; total seduction, 103;

starving children, 2; suicide, 11; slander, 7; sodomy, 4; "scandalous conduct," 1; "too free with the sisters," 1; "unchaste conduct," 1; "unministerial conduct," 2; "unchristian conduct," 11; "unbecoming conduct," 1; "unnamed crime," 2; unjust confinement of wife in an insane asylum, 1; "very uncourteous conduct," 1; vulgarity, 2; "vile, indecent, and profane language," 1; wanton conduct, 1; besides several crimes and cases omitted.

Of these 917 crimes on the part of Christian clergymen, 456 were against women in a sexual way, and 81 against women in other ways, or 544 against women especially.

Of this list of 477 criminal preachers the denomination of 208 has been preserved, leaving 269 not designated. Of the 208 the Methodists have 72, Baptists 42, Presbyterians 22, Catholics 19, Congregationalists 13, Church of England 10, Campbellites 6, Lutherans 6, Adventists 5, United Brethren 3, Hebrews 2, Dunkards 1, Universalists 1.

The percentage of the crimes of those whose denomination is preserved, as compared with the whole number, is as follows: Methodists 30 per cent, Baptists 20, Presbyterians 10, Catholics 10, Congregationalists 6, Lutherans 6, Episcopalians 5, Campbellites 3, Adventists 3, United Brethren 1.4, Hebrew 1, Dunkards ½, Universalists ½.

The definitions or names of crimes are chiefly those given by the several church courts where the reverend scoundrels were tried, sometimes probably given to partially hide the real offense. The compiler was enabled to ascertain that "unchaste conduct" meant a gross and beastly assault by the "divine messenger" upon a lady's chastity, and that "unministerial conduct" meant either adultery, rape, or seduction of some susceptible sister.

In addition to the foregoing cases the compiler has a large number of cases where the names of the reverend offender was not given. These of course could not be used. All these, with the hundreds and perhaps thousands of cases that were smothered and not suffered to come to the light, would indeed make a most formidable array against the moral conduct of the men who profess to be selected by heaven to break the bread of life to the innocent lambs of the fold. Just imagine for a moment what an appalling aggregate of priestly crime would be presented could this record have been made out for forty years of all the cases that have existed. The compiler says, "It must be recollected that the preacher hides his crime carefully, and his compeers and parishioners assist him to conceal it; while the night brawler, petty thief, and drunken wretch are under police surveillance."

How insolent and self-righteous, then, in you to cast unjust insinuations upon a class of citizens against whom you know little or nothing amiss, when there are such a great number of black criminals in your own ranks! This is a fair exhibit of Christian fairness and justice. It has been so for many generations. Self-righteous Christians have been guilty of the grossest offenses and crimes, and have been the most blatant and unjust in throwing insinuations and charges upon those who cannot believe in the grossest myths and shams. Where, then, indeed, is found the most practical and criminal Free-love? Why, in the churches, as I said. The foregoing cases are confined to the preachers alone, but all the crimes of the kind by deacons, class-leaders, Sunday-school superintendents, and all the rank and file of the churches would be such a record as would disgrace humanity, and cause Christians to hang their heads in shame.

It is perhaps not strange that you disapprove of publishing these cases against the clergymen of the land, the men who claim to hold a commission from the autocrat above the clouds to reveal his will and purposes, and to transact business for him on the earth. You doubtless think it very ill-advised to let the truth be known about such a vast number of hypocrites and false pretenders; but in my opinion the people have the right to know the truth. Millions upon millions of dollars earned by the sweat of the brow have been wrung from the confiding people to sustain this corrupt institution called the Christian church, and the priesthood are constantly represented as purer and better than other men. Millions every year are drawn from the toilers to sustain this idle, lecherous class of men in doling out to the people a mass of legends, absurdities, and falsehoods which the gullible masses swallow as though it was the choicest manna from heaven. It is time the whole truth was told. It is time that it be known; that these celestial gentry who claim they hold commissions from the heavenly world should be seen just as they are. The people who pay their money are entitled to the facts concerning the clergymen whom they pay.

It is very advisable for Christians of great and small degree to carefully cultivate their own vineyard, to curb and subdue their own passions, to check their own tendencies to impurity and crime, and not trouble themselves unduly about the offenses of Infidels and those who cannot accept the false representations made by the church. In this exercise of pulling beams out of their own eyes they will doubtless be better employed than in spending their time in hunting for motes in the eyes of their Infidel neighbors.

There is little doubt that Infidels and even Free-lovers, as a class, live quite as good lives, treat their fellow-men quite as justly, use as much honesty in their transactions with their fellow-men, and are no more lecherous, no greater libertines, than their Christian accusers, even the saintly clergy themselves.

The compiler of the pamphlet alluded to makes this offer: "There are of Freethinkers, including Atheists, Infidels, Spiritualists, etc., about seven millions in the United States. There are about seventy thousand priests and preachers. Now we make the following offer: We will give ten dollars apiece for crimes committed by any of these classes of Freethinkers within the last five years, and will take the report thereof as published in the newspapers, provided the preachers will give us one dollar apiece for the same evidence of crimes committed by reverends. Thus we offer ten dollars for one, and give them seven millions to draw their data from, while we have but seventy thousand."

You draw a dismal picture as to what will be the consequences of the universal prevalence of Atheism; but I apprehend that you are as wide of the mark in this fear as in the other positions you have taken. Inasmuch as Atheists possess quite as much intelligence as ordinary people, as they show as earnest a disposition to behave themselves properly as any class of people, as a small percentage of them are guilty of criminal conduct, it seems quite unnecessary for you to borrow trouble as to how they will misbehave in the future. They can hardly do any worse than believers in Yahweh and other gods have done. You accuse Buddhists with being Atheists, and a more moral class of people do not live, though they comprise several nationalities and more than one-third of the inhabitants of the globe. They are by far less disposed to dishonesty, double-dealing, lying, stealing, lechery, and nearly all manner of crimes than the worshipers of the Palestine Yahweh are guilty of. The fact is, men have depended far too much upon the gods and far too little upon themselves. If they will only learn to attend to the gods less, and to man more, the world will be vastly the better for it. We find here in this world quite enough to engage our attention and to occupy all our abilities, and it is unquestionably a very poor policy to neglect our duties to ourselves and those around us in behalf of imaginary gods on Olympus, above the clouds, or anywhere else. The gods have led man a weary, profitless journey for thousands of years. To keep up these gods and their immense retinue of greedy, grasping, hungry priests has cost poor man a great deal of hard toil, and a great share of his life-blood and strength. Now if man can learn to dispense with these gods and their lazy priests he will have more time to attend to his own affairs, and will get along much better for it. Man cannot be free and independent while he bows in allegiance to any tyrannous god. "There cannot be true liberty on earth while man worships a tyrant in heaven."

CONCLUSION.

We have now, Mr. Mair, reached the end of our discussion. I have endeavored to meet your arguments and claims with what ability I possess. You have not met all the arguments I have made, but I think I have let none of yours of any importance pass observation. Both of us have necessarily written hurriedly, and without using as much time as a more careful examination of the many subjects treated would have justified. But what we have done is before our readers, and it is for them to judge which has come the nearest to establishing his positions. You will not, I hope, deem me conceited if I claim that I have the most fully maintained my ground. You have managed your side with much ability; you have evinced extensive reading and much thought, but I have sympathized with you all along, because you have the weakest side of the argument to sustain. The truth is on my side, fresh and vigorous, while antiquated error and superstition are on yours. However much ability you may possess, you will ever find it very difficult to prove that which is unprovable. Your intentions have doubtless been good, and your efforts praiseworthy, but your cause is weak, errors are too abundant, and the proofs to sustain you are not within your reach. If, under these circumstances, you have failed in your undertaking, it is not strange, and a fair meed of praise is yours. If you have sometimes evinced a little unfairness, if you have been guilty of evasion, if you have sometimes dodged, if you have sometimes resorted to cant, if you have assumed what you have no knowledge of, it cannot be thought strange. It is the Christian style of argument, and you have only followed in the footsteps of your predecessors. But, all-in-all, I submit it to our readers that you have acquitted yourself with ability. If you have not proved your points, you have done as well as you could under the circumstances. That is as well as anybody can do.

In the outset you asked me what objections I had to Christianity. I have endeavored to show you and our readers what these objections are.

1. That it is not new; that all its dogmas were held by pagan systems before the Christian era.

2. That the Christian system contains monstrous ideas that ought not to be entertained by any lover of justice, to wit, that all the world was condemned to everlasting ruin by the offense of one man, and that he is now to inherit eternal glory and happiness by the merits of another individual. I cannot perceive the justice of millions of men being thrust into eternal misery because one man ate an apple, or nof these millions being made possessors of mansions in the skies because another gave up his life on the cross and took a short route to Paradise. Imputed condemnation and imputed righteousness are inconsistent with the grand principles of justice.

3. That salvation depends upon belief, when belief is not really under the control of any individual. Man is compelled to believe according to evidence and not otherwise. An intelligent person cannot possibly believe that black is white, that heat is cold, or that the pangs of hunger are the satisfied feelings of a full stomach. It is cruel in the extreme to send a man to hell for not believing that which he cannot believe, and unjust to send him to heaven simply for blindly accepting what he cannot possibly comprehend.

4. That the doctrine of the atonement is as unjust as it is absurd. The claim that a bad person can become righteous by the good deeds performed by another is as preposterous as that an otherwise good man is condemned by the bad actions of another. Would a strictly just man, though he had committed some faults, be willing that an innocent man should be put to death on his account?

5. That a belief in Christianity has not made the nations which embraced it more moral than the followers of other religions. In fact, dishonesty, cheating, swindling, fraud, lying, and stealing are more common, more general, in Christian countries than any other on the face of the earth.

6. That the punishment in eternal and infinite torture for the faults and mistakes of a short life on earth is excessive, unreasonable, cruel, and infinitely monstrous.

7. That Christianity has been the most cruel, bloody, relentless, persecuting, and unloving religion the world has known.

8. That it is opposed to freedom of thought, and an unimpeded exploration of the mind in philosophy and religion.

9. That it compels its ancient dicta to be accepted as the eternal truth, with no chance for advance. The revelation made nearly two thousand years ago is held to embrace the whole truth, and there can be no change, no improvement upon it. While all the arts, sciences, discoveries, etc., are constantly improving, Christianity and its doctrines are bound to stand stationary forever. There is no progression in a revelation from God.

10. That Christianity is insufficient to satisfy the longings of an aspiring, progressive, untrammeled, liberty-loving man. No fixed fetters and creeds can ever satisfy the spirit of progress.

11. That its superstitious belief in miracles—effects without natural causes—is a recognition of utter impossibilities—a class of phenomena that have never taken place.

12. That it employs in Christendom a retinue of hundreds of thousands of idle, pretentious, arrogant priests, who claim that they are employed by God to do his work, that they understand his will better than anybody else, and that they hold a commission from the court of heaven to dispense God's blessings and pronounce his curses upon the heads of hapless men and women. To support this arrogant and useless priesthood millions of human beings are compelled to dig the earth and toil early and late in the sweat of their brows and earn the money to pay these priests for telling what they and nobody else knows anything about. Ten millions of dollars per annum is a small sum to keep in idleness this mischievous, designing priesthood, and for the tissues of arrant falsehoods which they command the credulous masses to accept and believe, or go to hell.

13. That as a means of rendering mankind contented, happy, tranquil, loving, peaceful, promoting civilization, elevating woman, making man more resigned as to the destiny of the race in a future life, as a means of making man better here and assuring happiness hereafter, Christianity has been a huge failure and a fraud. Its claims are false, its representations are without truth, and its promises deceptive and worthless.

I will not, however, stop now to enumerate or repeat all the objections I have to Christianity. I have done this at considerable length in the foregoing discussion, and I will be glad if you and our readers hav profited somewhat by it. I will here take a brief review of the ground we have gone over, in regard to the positions I undertook to maintain, and see if I have succeeded in fulfilling the task I took upon myself.

In reply to your challenge for a discussion in your first letter I accepted it, and undertook, as you will recall, to prove the following propositions:

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA, THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY, HERODIAS, AND HER DAUGHTER SALOME.

It was deemed best to continue the histories of the Marys and their associates, even to the closing scenes of Jesus's career at the cross and sepulcher, rather than break the connection, and then return to other women that he met during his ministry, the majority of whom were ungodly until healed and proselyted by the son of God.

John alone gives us (chapter iv) an account of a wicked woman converted by Jesus at Jacob's well in Sychar, where he had sat himself down to rest while his disciples had gone into the city to buy meat. During their absence a woman of Samaria (her name is never given) came, as was the custom, to draw water. The bashfulness, modesty, and chastity of Jesus did not prevent him from addressing the stranger, though it is alleged by the learned ones that he knew her character from the first, knew that she would be at the well, came there for the express purpose of meeting her, and probably sent his disciples away in order to secure a private interview, to which is added the fact that the Jews considered the Samaritans as dogs, though descendants from Father Abraham like themselvs.

Jesus introduced himself by ordering this stranger to give him a drink. Surprised at his boldness, she thought to daunt him by inquiring, "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria, for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans?"

Then follows a long colloquy, in which Jesus tells her that if she only knew what a mighty personage he was she would ask him for drink, and that if she would but drink the living water that he could give her she would never thirst. Still more surprised, she tells him he has nothing to draw with, and the well is deep (about seventy feet). But he waves all her objections and cajoles her with his nonsense till she, like other foolish women, elated with the idea of getting rid of the burden of drawing water, listens to his oily tongue, and finally begs, "Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw."

Now Jesus has gained the first point. He has her under conviction (psychologized), and is sure of his convert, so he, in triumph, continues, "Go call thy husband and come hither." She frankly tells him she has no husband. Then he pretends he knew it before he asked her to go for him, and informs her that she has had five husbands, "and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband." Probably the sixth refused to marry, fearful of the tragic fate of his predecessors. Pretty good fortune-telling, guessing, or clairvoyance this! The woman, struck with the truth, proclaims him a prophet or medium, but goes on to argue that the mountain in which our fathers, the Samaritans, worshiped (Mount Gezurim) was just as good a place as Jerusalem, where the Jews held forth. Jesus reveals that God is a spirit, and that it makes no difference where the worship is performed if it is only done. She replies that when Messias, the Christ, comes he will straighten out all these little crooks and kinks. (Did he?)

Now has come the moment for Jesus to make himself known, and he speaks right out, not in meeting, but alone to this "guilty, sinful woman," as Brown calls her, "I that speak unto thee am he." Now is the secret out to this lone woman. He never spake so definitely to his disciples or own people, scarcely ever said he was the Christ or the son of God, but to this woman of bad reputation he gives his confidence. Wonder who wrote it down, he or she, for they were alone?

Oh, such a gush as Brown makes over it! Quite equal to the mawkishness of the press over an intended tragedy recently. He says "her simplicity was perfect." So we should infer without any revelation from God or man. Just such perfect simplicity as is required to make a good Christian nowadays.

But just at this opportune moment the disciples must come blustering back and end the fun, for the woman, without saying "good-by" or "thank you" when she saw them, dropped her water-pot and ran to the city in great excitement, crying out, "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did! Is not this the Christ?"

What a whopper! According to the account, he told her but two things about herself, viz., her five husbands and her present unmarried, Freelove life. How strange that the Samaritan city should believe on him when such a character was his heralder! They knew he could not tell her in one short conversation "all things she ever did." But, strange to say, like modern dupes, the more mysterious and impossible, the more they ran after him, for not satisfied with this one hearsay miracle, they got him to remain with them two days, and many more believed; not simply believed him a good fortune-teller, or believed the facts when seen by themselves, but went farther, and said, "We know this is the Christ, the savior of the world," just as nowadays many a one, under the knowledge of unaccounted-for phenomena, has exclaimed, "Come, see a medium who told me all things I ever did. I know that this is indeed spirits."

Yea, Christians declare that this one case establishes the divinity of Christ, for how could he have known the number of husbands the woman had had and the other fact unless he was God? Indeed, how could he? He might have heard of it just as mediums are accused of knowing things and professing spirit revelation, or he might have been as good a psychometer as some who now inhabit the earth and are almost perfect mind-readers.

If this fact, as Christians claim it to be, proves the divinity of Christ, it proves too much, for the prophets in the Old Testament and the disciples in the New are said to have done as great things as Jesus, therefore the same would be a proof of their divinity, and also that of every modern medium who has told the number of husbands, wives, or children any person might have had.

Brown says, "She was transported, forgot everything but one, and, her heart running over with the tale she had to tell, she hastens home and pours it out." Now what trust in the tale of such an excited, crazed fanatic? Christians will not believe she was crazy, but say mediums and their followers are, when they do and believe exactly such things; and be it said in their defense, not all of them have had five husbands nor are known to be living in open Freelovism with a sixth man, as it is boldly declared of this woman with whom the son of God had such a confab, and whom he selected as his preacher to the Samaritans. Surely he ate with publicans, sinners, and harlots, and chose them as his vicegerents. Spiritual manifestations, so-called, must either be elevated to the divinity of Christ and his miracles, or else Christ and his miracles must be brought down to the fortune-telling and jugglery of modern mediumship, for they are in the same category, must be accounted for on the same principle, and rise or fall together. Let the church remember this when contending for the miracles and divinity of Christ and denouncing modern Spiritualism and mediums as devilish and devils.

Moreover, when the disciples returned to Jesus they marveled that he talked with the woman. Why? simply because she was a Samaritan? The inference is they knew her to be a woman of the town. Now if they could see in a moment by her appearance her true character, why could not Jesus without any divinity on his part, or revelation from his father God! None of the disciples reproved or questioned him, yet feeling the predicament in which he was placed, he excused himself from eating when urged, with, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." It appears that the enjoyment and excitement of the two was about equal, and they were mutual friends on a very short acquaintance; and yet on such flimsy stuff as this will Christians make assertions, hang an argument, base a doctrine, and damn all sensible people who will not credit as facts their moonshine, called such by themselves, when demonstrated before their eyes through modern mediums in this nineteenth century of the Christian era.

Another vile woman, who, like the former, is considered of sufficient importance to be intrusted with a name, is forced upon us by John, and as in the other instance, by John alone, in chapter viii. These women seem to be introduced, not on their own merits, but to reveal the supernatural smartness of God's only begotten son, for who but a son of God or God himself could manifest such penetration, comprehensiveness, and justice as was displayed in these two miraculous scenes? But to the romance.

Some men, so the story goes, desiring to get Jesus into trouble, one day while he was in the temple teaching, when "all the people came unto him" (all is a small word, but signifies the whole. Such exagerations are St. John's style, remember, viz., "All things I ever did"), seized a woman, and dragged her before this quasi judge and king with the charge, "Master, this woman was taken in adultery, in the very act."

Before proceeding farther, let us examine with care this accusation. These men averred that they caught her in the very act! A wonderful catch! How is this act performed? Alone by a woman with herself? Is no other person engaged in an act of adultery but a woman? Can a man perform an act of adultery alone with himself? Can a man commit an act of adultery anyway, and if so, how? Could a woman be caught in the very act of adultery and no man present? If not, why did not these male accusers haul him before their male God-judge? We read in Deut. xxii, 22, that if a man be found lying with an woman married to an husband they shall both of them die, whether he be married or not, and the penalty is (Ezek. xvi, 40, 41), "They shall stone thee with stones and thrust thee through with swords, and burn thy houses with fire."

Now it is presumable that this woman must have been by some mysterious, miraculous intervention of divine providence caught in the very act of adultery all alone, for had any man been there participating, the penalty being death equally for man or woman, he also would have been seized and brought into the presence of the great divine master to have been judged with his companion in crime. But these scribes and Pharisees are silent as to any man, Jesus makes no inquiry for a man (John in the narrative makes no allusion to a man; as far as the story indicates, there was no man), but Jesus proceeds to perform his part of the sacred farce as if perfection in rehearsal had made him an equal with the other clowns in the sickening drama. How much more godlike, nay, like human justice, it would have been for him to have excused himself from meddling in a matter that belonged to the magistrates, or demanded of these men to produce the guilty male, and if none was forthcoming to have turned upon these accusers and scored them down with, "Yes, you men, permit an adulterer to escape, seize the adulteress, drag her here to me, a man, expose her before a multitude in order to catch me in my decision, clear yourselves, cover up the crimes of your own sex and my sex with your pretensions and hypocrisy! I have nothing to do with the judging or convicting of women under the laws of the land. Go your ways and I will continue my teaching." But no; anxious to make a boom as usual, Jesus goes through a maudlin performance not unlike some modern mediums, which renders him liable to be suspected of being a deceiver and an adulterer through the rendering of his own verdict. When the men all left, after he told them, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her," why did he not cast the first stone if he was innocent of the same crime and his was a righteous decision?

The point is, according to the sequel, every man among them had violated the seventh commandment. A pretty lot were they thus to drag a helpless woman before this king of the Jews, and expose her frailty, they the stronger sex and she the weaker! Probably it was with some of these very men that she committed adultery, like Judah of old, and that was the reason she was so easily discovered "in the very act," having been betrayed by these lustful monsters. Like Eve of apple-tree notoriety, she probably was the tempter also. What a pity God ever converted a rib into a woman! If he had not, on whom could man have laid the blame? But to return. Now if there had been one innocent man there, according to Jesus's rendering he would have had a right to have cast the first stone. If Jesus had been guiltless would he not have had that right, and would it not have been his duty to hav availed himself of that privilege? It is inferable that, being guilty of Freelove and Beecherism, he full well knew the character of these other hypocrites around him—"set a rogue to catch a rogue"—and not thinking the woman very bad after all, and desirous of saving her, he thought he would give them just a gentle practical twit upon facts, not having depth of character sufficient to perceive that if he did not stone her he would implicate himself by showing that he was in the same boat with the infamous crew around him. This is the way the Christians would construe a similar account told of a modern medium, and the ungodly woman's "constructions" and "probabilities" are to be regarded in the explanation of their ancient sacred fables of as much consequence as are their "conjectures" respecting modern manifestations. It is surprising why such a silly story, one so palpably thin, should ever have been stuck into God's word, unless to show, as alleged, the wonderfulness of the surpassing wisdom of this half-man god, yet in which any unprejudiced person, not a theologian, can trace innumerable fallacies and readily detect this flaw in the judgment of his divine majesty, also this possible stain on his male virginity.

No wonder the revisers want to eliminate this disgusting fiction from the New Testament, but it is still there, at least, in the contrasted copy we have secured, and which is now before us. They have suspected it was spurious for many long years, but would not give it up, as it was a luscious morsel from which to make capital for repentant female prostitutes in the winning, "Go and sin no more," so often in the mouths of the modern Jesus Beecherites. For proof of this knowledge read Brown's confession of its existence: "This whole narrative is wanting in some of the earliest and most valuable manuscripts, and those which have it vary to some extent. The internal evidence in its favor is almost overpowering. It is easy to account for its omission, though genuine; but if not so, it is next to impossible to account for its insertion."

Fudge! We cannot see why it should not have been inserted if not genuin; it is quite as sensible as most of the twaddle about the godlike performances of Captain Jesus, and serves to show that either a woman could commit adultery alone, or that the male particevs criminis was not to be included in the arrest, trial, and punishment for the offense, thus binding closer and closer the slavish chains of sex on woman instead of elevating her, as pretended, thorough this preëmption and forgiveness of sin by the Sabbath-breaker, blasphemer, seditionist, and usurper Jesus Christ.

We wish time and space would admit of quotations from the gushing nausea of the commentators, that the reader might become conversant with the policy of the clergy in securing sympathy for an imaginary woman under the guise of hero-worship, man-worship, or idol-worship of an infinite myth called Jesus Christ or God.

It is supposable that the "woman of Samaria" and the "woman taken in adultery" were both converted and became holy, so they can be classed among the godly ones, but it is not so apparent that the two we now introduce were ever brought into the ark of safety and cleansed through the pure washings of the blood of the Lamb.

By consulting Matt. xiv, 1–13, Mark vi, 14–30, Luke iii, 19, the reader will gain possession of the events as recorded in the lives of Herodias and her daughter Salome.

Herodias was the granddaughter of Herod the Great, and daughter of Aristobulus (one of the sons of Marianne and Herod the Great), and consequently sister of Agrippa I. She first married Herod Philip I., but was afterward prevailed upon Herod Antipas, her husband's half-brother, to forsake her husband and live with him on condition that he should put away his own wife, who was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. She was the neice of both her husbands (Josephus's Antiquities.)

It appears that John the Baptist had somewhat interested Herod in his favor, but happening one day to say that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife, Herodias was terribly enraged, and would have killed him, but Herod did not dare to do that, for he feared the multitude, because they counted him as a prophet, so he threw him into prison. He had been shut up there about a year, when, on his birthday, Herod made a great supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee. Now all the trouble was caused by Herod getting high and making a foolish oath inspired by woman's fascination, and not by his wife either, but by his step-daughter Salome. Her amorous dancing so set him beside himself that he swore he would grant her whatever she asked, if it was the half of his kingdom. She, like a good girl and dutiful daughter, went to her ma to inquire what she should ask for a present from her step-father. Now was Herodias's opportunity, and she eagerly embraced it by instructing Salome to ask for the head of John the Baptist in a charger. The king was not so far gone but what he realized at once the scrape he had got himself into, but he would not break his oath, therefore sent out his orders, and the head was brought in and given to the damsel, and the damsel gave it to her mother.

Now this was a horrid sight and a shocking affair, but was it any worse than for Rahab the harlot to betray her whole nation into the hands of the enemy, or than for Jael to drive with her own treacherous hand a tent nail through the head of Sisera and pin him to the floor, after she had invited him to accept protection beneath her roof? Yes, it makes all the difference imaginable, for Herodias was the means of the death of one of God's ministers, while Rahab and Jael helped God kill his foes and save his chosen Israel. It was right and commendable for Rahab and Jael to aid in butchering men, women, and children for the Lord, but all wrong and damnable for Jezebel and Herodias to get rid of their enemies in a similar manner. For Jael's godly deed Deborah the prophetess sang, "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be." The latter were godly women; the former, fiends incarnate. Abraham could marry his sister and put her away for fear of his own cowardly life, lie with her maid, and beget a son thereby; Jacob could have two sister-wives and two concubines; Judah could hav twins by his daughter-in-law, whom he thought a harlot; Lot could be the grandfather of his own children by his daughters; the man after God's own heart impregnate another man's wife and then kill him to conceal it; the wisest man that ever lived or should live could have a thousand wives and concubines, and much more, and worse and worse, Father God could violate his own commands, libertinize himself, become the illegitimate son of his own adultery in order to appease his own wrath through his own death, and "scheme" out a plan of salvation for a guilty world*, and not one intimation in the whole Bible, New Testament or Old, that there was any wrong in these relations or in the birth of these illegitimate offspring; but all at once John the Baptist is seized with a terrible spasm of virtue, as was Constantine, and reproved Herod for marrying his brother's wife. Old Jake took to himself two sister brides in the space of seven days; nothing bad in that; cohabited with both alternately; begat children by both, with the two concubines thrown in to boot!

But what a howling these ancient saints and modern Josephs make over this one case, because John lost his head by meddling with what did not concern him! Any worse for him to lose his head than for Joan of Arc, Lady Jane Grey, Madame Roland, Charlotte Corday, than for Mary Dyer and other accused witches to be hung, than for millions of men, women, and children to be sacrificed to the bloody rage of Christian holiness? Oh, shame, that these villians should now prate and howl over the death of one victim, when their own system of salvation requires persecution even unto the death, and human sacrifices have been, by every kind of torture, offered up as holocausts to an "infinite nothing," misnamed God, who could devise no better "scheme of salvation" than to sacrifice himself to himself and for himself, by tumbling headlong from the skies and dying in filth and blood. Such murderers of human beings and believers in the begetting of a bastard god on which to found a religion have no business to open their mouths in accusation of any earthly creature. Notwithstanding all this, Brown and others load all the blame, as usual, upon Herodias and Salome, exonerating the wicked Herod and prating about "his paramour's rage," as if he was one of the holy innocents and never did anything in all his life, "hardly ever." One would suppose by the doleful lamentations of Brown that these two women committed a rape upon his majesty! Poor man! He says, "Abandoned women are more shameless and heartless than men." Are they always so? Is every such woman worse than any such men? Oh, what a pity, what a pity, that God ever made her, since man would have been an angel without her pernicious influence! But it cannot be helped, and so Brown and the rest of the saints must make the best of a bad job.

And what became of these women? History informs us that Herod was banished at Lugdunum, that Herodias voluntarily shared his punishment, not so bad a woman after all, and that they died in exile; that Salome married in the first place Philip, the tetrarch of Trachonitis, her paternal uncle; and, secondly, Aristobulus, the king of Chalcis.

We are informed further, in the sacred scriptures, that when John was beheaded, his disciples came, and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jesus. Though these two preachers were second cousins, yet the death of John seems to hav had no other effect upon Jesus than to frighten him away into a desert place apart, he crossing to the other side in a ship, to avoid apprehended consequences to himself, arising from the Baptist's death. What a courageous god! What an example for imitation!

*This passage was originally written in a series of twelve articles, which were published in New York city in 1855 in a Christian Spiritualist paper. This passage was thrown out, being considered too radical for publication; consequently this is the first time it was ever seen in print, though twenty-six years old.—THE UNGODLY WOMAN.

A Liberal Picnic.

Liberals can hav picnics, with all modern improvements, as well as church folks, only they can hav the best modern improvement of all, namely, to hav them on Sunday instead of going to church. The Christians hav not got quite so far as this, but we hope they will, and so dispense with ministers and substitute coffee and cake in their place. In that case I should be very willing to join the church.

Frankel is president of the Newark Liberal League, and he is a very lively fellow, and so the League is a very lively League and goes upon its way rejoicing. During the past season it has sustained a very successful course of Sunday-evening lectures.

This League, under the blessed inspiration of its president, determined to hav a picnic during its summer vacation, on Sunday, July 17th, to which we were cordially invited and to which we went. We started out bright and early, leaving the churches with their clattering bells and still more clattering ministers behind, and met a goodly company of "awfully wicked" Liberals on the banks of the beautiful Passaic, bent upon breaking the Sabbath all to pieces by having a splendid time in the temple not made with hands. In due time the magnificent little steam tug Cora Mandal made its appearance, and about thirty of us boys and girls, anywhere from "sweet sixteen" to eighty years, jumped on board and were soon speeding swift as the flight of a lark up the gleaming river. We had a jolly banjo on board, which took the place of an organ, and we had religious services all the way except that we didn't take up a collection. A ride of eight miles brought us to Asbury grove, and here we scattered ourselvs upon the grass and listened to the music of the winds as they swept through the branches of the trees, and we dreamed dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before. Then of course we grew hungry, and a bounteous lunch was spread, with all sorts of generous refreshments. Then we wandered to the bank of the river, as it sparkled in the afternoon's sun; some took a bath and some a sail, and then we returned to the pavilion, and, ye gods, will it be believed? there was a nice little dance, a square dance, a round dance, and a jig, while the "harp of the Lord," namely, the banjo, which I hope will be played in heaven, put the music into souls and heels. I don't think that David himself enjoyed dancing any better than we did, and if he could dance before the ark, why couldn't we do the same? Then we had some singing. We poured forth a few revival hymns. Then of course there must be some speeches, and I was the fated one to do that sort of "grinding out." We girded our loins to the task and produced the following remarks, which we report for the sake of those who were not present, for we think we hav therein expressed the ideas of the new religion:

"The religion of Liberalism means, first of all, that we are to make a heaven here and not hereafter. We don't know about the hereafter, and until we get there we can make no provision for it. We cannot cross a bridge until we reach it. Meanwhile let us make the best of the journey we are now traveling. Here in this world is our duty and our destiny. Here we are to be angels if anywhere. Heaven lies in the thousand possibilities by which we are surrounded, in the tiniest blade of grass and in the splendor of the sun. It is in the great beating, throbbing heart of nature herself.

"We are to attain this heaven by work; by a grand, ideal purpose; by energy and devotion. We cannot float into the millennium; we must struggle for it with every faculty that we hav. We must be on fire with sublime determination. Man himself is the god that must create the cosmos. He is the artist who must paint the future with the divinest colors. His brain, his muscle, must be the formativ powers of the universe.

"Nevertheless, man must play as well as work. He must hav recreation, amusement, or else he cannot do his best. It is the mission of Liberalism not only to make men work, but to make men play. Thus the greatest things are accomplished—the sublimest poetry, the most glowing pictures. Work must be a sort of play in order to be the most successful work. We must laugh and sing and dance—surrender ourselvs to absolute enjoyment in order to bring all our varied faculties into exercise.

"Therefore we must consecrate Sunday to the play impulse. It must be a grand holiday. We must consecrate it to jollity—to rich and sweet enjoyment upon the bosom of nature. We must not go to meeting and listen to dull sermons, but to the woods and streams, and be as merry as we can. We must go into the glittering temple of earth and sky, where the trees are singing, and the flowers and grass are shining, and the waters leaping and flashing, and let ourselvs loose in pure enjoyment, like the bird that sings at the gate of heaven.

"Work and play are the blending forces by which a noble manhood and womanhood are produced."

After these remarks Mr. Avery read a poem on the beauty of nature-worship, and the banjo gave its benediction, and we wended our way to the river and packed ourselvs on board the Coramandel, and, in the gorgeous evening light, went dashing down the river.

Divine Providence was with us sure. Not an accident happened, and the day was surpassingly beautiful. The ministers could not hav a word to say; but if we had drowned, oh, what a sweet morsel they would hav rolled under their tongues! If we had even broken a leg, what a quantity of sermons would hav been hurled at our devoted heads! As it is, the ministers must keep a discreet silence. We had such a happy time that they hav nothing wherewith "to point a moral." They must fall back upon the old sinners.

Now I think that Liberals through the country had better go in for picnics, especially on Sunday. It will be a grand reformatory movement. It will help create fellowship. It will carry consternation into the hearts of our orthodox friends. Nothing could so disturb them as to see us having a good time on Sunday, for their desire is to make us as miserable as possible and giv us a foretaste of hell in this life. But if they see that we get the start of them and hav our heaven here and now they will be dreadfully scandalized. Let us show them the right use of Sunday, that it is a gala day, wherein we are to hav all the fun we can.

A Liberal picnic on Sunday is a nice little bombshell to throw occasionally into the orthodox camp. It will make things lively and pleasant.

The Freethinkers' Convention.

HOW TO GET THERE.

Persons residing west of Chautauqua Lake who desire to attend the Freethinker's Convention should purchase an excursion ticketto Chautauqua Lake and return. These tickets can be procured at almost any depot in any of the large towns or cities of the West at very low rates. The Erie railroad will return home all who attend the Convention over that road or any of its branches at one-third the usual rates, and the Elmira, Ithaca & Utica railroad will do the same. Persons wishing further information will please apply to the undersigned, inclosing stamp.

A FIRM giving checks on a bank in some distant country—a country not to be found in any gazetteer of ascertained places, nor laid down in any chart, and from which no persons who ever set out in search of it were ever known to return—would do very little business among prudent men. Yet this is precisely the nature of the transactions engaged in by the orthodox firms who undertake to conduct for mankind the business of this life.—George J. Holyoake.

1. That Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from older systems of religion. I claim that I have fully established this proposition, and cheerfully submit it to our readers if I have not done so.

2. That there is not a dogma, rite, sacrament nor ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems five hundred years, and more, before Christianity was known in the world. I claim that I have shown this, and leave it for our readers to decide.

3. That the belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. I claim to have shown this conclusively.

4. That miracles and supernatural achievements have been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus. I claim that I have clearly sustained this position.

5. That other so-called saviors and redeemers have been believed in—to have been crucified, to have died on the cross—many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. I claim to have fully sustained this proposition.

6. That the story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical, neither having been written by himself nor any of his apostles, nor corroborated by any contemporaneous history. I claim that I have unmistakably established the truth of this proposition, a most damaging one to Christianity.

7. That the teachings of Jesus are defective in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and that they were equaled by many who preceded him by several centuries. I claim to have fully proved the truth of this.

8. That what are called the four gospels are unauthentic or spurious productions; that not one of them was written by the person whose name it bears, and were not known to be in existence till one hundred and fifty years after the reputed death of Jesus. I claim to have clearly established the truth of this proposition, and that it is extremely damaging to the system I have been opposing.

9. That there were a large number of gospels and epistles written in the first few Christian centuries, which in correctness and inspiration vied with those which were accepted, but were not admitted into the canon. I claim to have abundantly shown this to be true.

10. That the early Christian Fathers were designing, hypocritical, and dishonest; and that their contentions and quarrels about matters of faith and the authenticity of certain gospels and epistles continued for centuries. I claim that I have shown this to be strictly true.

11. That the doctrines of Christianity are not true, and have produced great unhappiness among mankind. I claim to have made this truth as clear as the noonday sun.

12. That Christianity has not been a blessing to the world, but rather a curse. I claim to have fully established the truth of this proposition.

13. That the leaders and bright stars in the Christian church have been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known. I claim to have clearly shown the truth of this.

14. That instead of Christianity being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed; and that it has caused more persecution, wars, and loss of life than any other religion, and more than all other religions put together. I claim that I have firmly established she truth of this proposition.

15. That it has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood; that it has retarded education and science in the world, and to this extent has been a serious impediment and a curse to the race. I claim that I have shown the truth of this as clearly as the sun in the heavens.

16. That the system is founded upon pretended supernaturalism, a quality or condition which has no real existence. I claim that I have clearly proved this.

17. That the Bible from which Christianity obtains its authority is not true, not divinely inspired, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles of nature. I trust I have made this quite apparent. Many further proofs could have been produced had time and space admitted of it.

18. That the Bible was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge and truth, and could not have been dictated by a God of infinite truth and wisdom.

19. That the Bible and Christianity recognize and confirm the tyranny of kings and despots, which is opposed to the best interests and happiness of the human race, and that neither has raised a protest against slavery and oppression, but both assert that all power is of God. I claim to have demonstrated the truth of this.

20. That the Bible and Christianity have oppressed woman and have deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is entitled. I claim to have shown the truth of this in the strongest manner.

21. That the Bible and Christianity have upheld the most obnoxious system of kingcraft and priestcraft which the world has known. I claim to have shown this to be strictly true.

22. That the Bible and Christianity have made war on witchcraft—something which has had no real existence—by which thousands and even millions of hapless human beings have been tortured to death in the most cruel manner. You will hardly deny that I clearly showed this to be true.

23. That the Bible and Christianity are not the source and cause of civilization and education in the world, and that they have not been the cause of human welfare; but, to the reverse of this, that they have favored ignorance and slavery. I strongly claim that I have clearly proved this to be true.

24. That the Bible and Christianity are unprogressive in their nature, but claim to be founded by a divine fiat, concerning which there can be no advance or improvement, and in this respect are unlike the arts, sciences, as architecture, mechanism, sculpture, painting, astronomy, geology, mathematics, etc. I trust I have sufficiently elucidated the truth of this.

25. That the Bible and Christianity do not teach the highest class of truth, the best variety of religion, which mankind are capable of receiving; that they are of the past and not the present; that as they cost incomputable treasures in labor and money to sustain them, and as science, reason, and truth teach a far better and truer religion, at only a fraction of the cost, the world should discard the former and embrace the latter. I claim that I have shown this position to be true, the same as all the preceding propositions. And I again repeat that I will submit it to our readers whether I have not made these claims good.

With equal truth and candor I am impelled to claim that you have failed to disprove a single one of the foregoing propositions or to prove a single one of the claims you have set up in opposition. I will again submit it to our candid readers whether what I here assert is not strictly true.

I will not dwell upon your evasions, your careful silence as to many of my arguments, or what seems like arrogance, assumed superiority, cant, and self-righteousness. These are so common with the defenders of your system that they excite no surprise either in myself or in our readers.

I will take the space here to again state that you have brought to the defense of Christianity the ablest and best arguments that can possibly be adduced in its favor. Not one clergyman in ten thousand could excel the ability you have evinced; but the simple truth is, Christianity is weak and indefensible; it is founded on assumptions and untruths, and is extremely weak in the essentials of proof and confirmation. It is perfectly untenable so far as truth and demonstration are concerned, and for sixteen centuries it has been sailing under false colors; it has been guilty of the worst species of fraud yet imposed on the human race, and is unequivocally one of the most consummate shams that man has known.

I will just allude to the fact that I have faithfully printed your letters containing your best arguments in favor of your pet system, and from week to week have laid them before fifty thousand readers that they might thus be permitted to see what the best defense is which can be presented in favor of this revamped system of religious belief. While I do not wish to claim any special virtue for doing this, I will venture the claim that it is far, far more than any Christian paper or periodical would do for me or for Infidelity. I do not believe that there is an orthodox journal in the United States that would allow me three inches of space in which to state the truths of Radicalism. This very fact is a strong proof of the superior fairness and fearlessness of Infidelity over Christianity.

I have indulged the hope that this discussion would present new views to your mind and enable you to see the greater and clearer truths which exist without the pale of the current system of faith, and that you would gradually become convinced of the error which for years you have been laboring under. But if my desires in this direction have not been fully realized I will not despair; you have too much intelligence to remain a permanent and life-long devotee of the worst system of superstition and error to which men have given their allegiance. Let it be hoped that the seeds of truth which have here been sown in your mind may have fallen on good soil, and that in due time the same will germinate, grow to healthy life, and bring forth beautiful flowers and delicious fruits of scientific truths and nature's superior morals. If, however, this happiness by any means is not to be yours, I earnestly hope that our many readers will be profited by what we have had to say, and that many who were groping in darkness may be enlightened by the light of reason and truth, and that they may clearly see the superiority of nature and her teachings over all the myths, superstitions, and theological dogmas which for thousands of years have cursed the world.

I will close this protracted discussion with two quotations from Prof. J. W. Draper. In considering the decadence of the rule of myths and the advance of light and truth, he says: "All the delusions which occupied the minds of our forefathers, and from which not even the powerful and learned were free, have totally passed away. The moonlight has now no fairies; the solitude no genius; the darkness no ghost, no goblin. There is no necromancer who can raise the dead from their graves—no one who has sold his soul to the devil and signed the contract with his blood—no angry apparition to rebuke the crone who has disquieted him. Divination, agromancy, pyromancy, hydromancy, cheiromancy, augury, interpreting of dreams, oracles, sorcery, astrology, have all gone. It is three hundred and fifty years since the last sepulchral lamp was found, and that was near Rome. There are no gorgons, hydras, chimeras; no familiars; no incubus or succubus. The housewives of Holland no longer bring forth sooterkins by sitting over lighted chauffers. No longer do captains buy of Lapland witches favorable winds; no longer do our churches resound with prayers against the baleful influences of comets, though there still linger in some of our noble old rituals forms of supplication for dry weather and rain, useless, but not unpleasing reminiscences of the past. The apothecary no longer says prayers over the mortar in which he is pounding to impart a divine afflatus to his drugs. Who is there now that pays fees to a relic, or goes to a saint's shrine to be cured? These delusions have vanished with the night to which they appertained, yet they were the delusions of fifteen hundred years. In their support might be produced a greater mass of human testimony than probably could be brought to bear upon any other matter of belief in the entire history of man; and yet, in the nineteenth century, we have come to the conclusion that the whole, from the beginning to the end, was a deception! Let him, therefore, who is disposed to balance the testimony of past ages against the dictates of his own reason ponder on this strange history; let him who relies on the authority of human evidence in the guidance of his opinions, now settle with himself what that evidence is worth" (Intellectual Development of Europe, p 412).

In the conclusion of his "Conflict," he says: "As to the issue of the coming conflict can any one doubt? Whatever is resting on fiction and fraud will be overthrown. Institutions that organize impostures and spread delusions must show what right they have to exist. Faith must render an account of herself to reason. Mysteries must give place to facts. Religion must relinquish that imperious, that domineering position which she has so long maintained against science. There must be absolute freedom for thought. The ecclesiastic must learn to keep himself within the domain he has chosen, and cease to tyrannize over the philosopher, who, conscious of his own strength and the purity of his motives, will bear such interference no longer. What was written by Esdras near the willow-fringed rivers of Babylon more than twenty-three centuries ago still holds good—'As for truth, it endureth and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth for evermore.'"

I am done. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

PORT HOPE, ONT., July 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: If this round-the-world trip sohuld prove disastrous to you and a damage to the spread of Freethought and mental liberty no blame can be attached to me for any word of encouragement to make the journey. But as it is now a settled matter of fact that you go, I am with you with all my heart, and I hope you may hav a prosperous journey and a happy return.

The matter of illustrating the work has been discussed here and a party said to me that he would giv fifty dollars for that purpose. I hope Canada may hav credit for the suggestion and some substantial aid.

The lucid manner in which you gave us the "In fidel Abroad" will lead to high expectation in the work that is to come, and I hav an idea that none will be disappointed. Inclosed is $5 for the work.

Yours truly, WILLIAM SISSON.

MONTREAL, CAN., July 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I was most agreeably surprised to notice by postal card of 13th inst that you had not allowed the press of other business to prevent you from looking after the balance of my book-order, and while regretting that you could not find what was wanted, I am greatly obliged for your kind attention and trouble.

Having concluded that the account of your proposed trip around this planet of ours will prove of deep interest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I beg toin close $5 toward the cause, and trust that the results of the journey will be highly beneficial to your good self and that you will return safely, freighted with fresh thoughts regarding the condition of humanity in the various countries through which your travels may lead you. Farewell.

Yours faithfully, WM. T. COSTIGAN.

LEMOORE, CAL., July 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav obtained at this late hour another subscriber for around the world and herewith forward postal order for same ($5) for Dr. R. F. Wilson. Yours truly, S. MOORE, M. D.

HAMBURG, N. Y., July 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Hoping I am not too late with my mite, please find inclosed postal order for $5 to help you on your trip around the world. A prosperous journey, and a safe return to your family and riends. You promis a rich feast for the small sum we send you. Respectfully yours, MRS. E. M. SICKMON.

NUNDA, N. Y., July 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that you are about ready to start on the round-the-world trip, hence I inclose my mite to help you along a little. Please acknowlege in the list of names with a star. My best wishes will attend you.

I am with much respect, J. S. BECKLEY.

WATERLOO, N. Y., July 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: With your permission I thought I would come in at the eleventh hour to help you on your journey round the globe. Inclosed please find $5 for that purpose and 15 cents for "Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity." My best wishes go with you. May all the great forces of nature conspire to giv you a pleasant voyage.

Your friend, HENRY BONNELL.

BLOOMINGTON, WIS., June 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is postal order for $8—$3 to apply to apply on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 for your contemplated trip around the world, acting on the old maxim better late than never. One of my best friends and a first-class Christian says, "Why don't you send Mr. Bennett $5? You are sure to get your money's worth of good books." So you see there is some little interest manifested in your behalf by an old member of the Methodist church. It seems like a ray of sunshine through the dark cloud of theology and superstition, and I hastened at once to act upon it. I hav read carefully your discussion with Mr. G. M. Mair, and I cannot see that his arguments possess any great weight or merit. He is like the great majority of divines. What they lack in argument they try to make up in assurance and pomposity. He goes a great deal upon the "thus saith the Lord" style, having often to go to the old Jew book to prove his arguments, and then he says it proves the extremes to which you are driven. I would like a photo of the reverend gentleman to see what kind of a cheek he has. Methinks a government mule would turn aside and blush.

His arguments to prove the existence of a God are transparent and decidedly weak. They offer no reason, they produce no conviction, but entrench themselvs behind their church desks, and all who oppose their pet schemes of salvation are Infidels. Hoping your journey around the world will be a pleasant one and that you will return in safety to your home, I remain, Yours truly, B. WOODHOUSE.

NAPLES, N. Y., June 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send you to-day $2 in payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sorry to be behind, but do the best I can.

The $5 pledged by my friend has not been paid in. I will send it to you as soon as paid in.

I hope your trip around the world will be a grand success every way.

I think you hav got Mr. Mair fairly on the hip. Hold him to God's responsibility in the apple transaction; study closely the 5th and 22d verses of the 3d chapter of Genesis, and you will see that Adam was not to blame. How could he be held responsible for an act before his eyes were opened and before he knew good and evil? It was only after he had partaken of the forbidden fruit that his eyes were opened and he knew good and evil. If God allowed him to go it blind, the blame must attach to God and not to Adam. Before partaking of the forbidden fruit Adam was in the condition of a blind idiot or lunatic so far as right and wrong were concerned. But the whole story is too silly for serious thought.

Hoping that nothing may happen to mar the pleasure of your long journey, and that you may be spared to us many years after your return,

I am truly yours, JOHN PECK.

GRANDVIEW, June 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I was aware that I was indebted to you on subscription, but what signifies that? Don't you know that Mother Shipton, or some other of the prophets, has foretold the end of the world, and that prophecies, Bible and others, are always fulfilled? Why, Bennett, what is the matter? Don't you know how people love to calculate and economize? But if the Shipton prediction comes true, how nice it will pay you and all my other debts! It will wipe out with one grand stroke all those little differences, and put us on an equality! Don't you see how it is yourself? What should I pay you for when accounts will all be squared any way? But stop a little; my faith is not as strong as it was in early life; the end may not come this year. I hav been watching the signs of the times. I doubt. I see the trees hav donned their summer garb; the earth is clothed in her green velvet; the flowers look as lovely and smell as sweet as ever; the sun still shines as in the days of my youth; the song of the birds in the forest has the same cheering effect; the air breathes as sweet and the stars shine as bright as ever. All nature seems gay and lovely, a perfect paradise on earth. No, stop, come to think, I hav not paid Bennett, and if the Shipton prophecy fails I am a defaulter and Bennett has been wronged out of his money. That won't do. So here is your order. Now if the end comes I won't need it; if not, I will hav religion, that is, will hav done what I conceive to be right. Good success to your trip around the circle and to THE TRUTH SEEKER during your absence. Please don't forget to send me a pebble or a grain of sand from the top of Mount Sinai. It would be such a nice thing to keep, oh, how sacred!

Yours, as ever, D. J. SHERER.

GILMAN, IND., June 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: My subscription having expired as a trial subscriber April 1st, please find inclosed $3 to renew my subscription. Orthodoxy seems to hav come to a standstill here at this place with but little enthusiasm left it. Two or three years ago Liberals and Infidels were scarcely known, now they form a considerable portion of the thinking community. They are unorganized. Liberal papers are read with interest, Liberal books and tracts hav found their way here, the people hav begun to doubt and investigate, and lose faith in what our fathers thought conclusiv evidence. Truly yours,

SAMUEL LAMAR.

WHEATLAND, OR., May 28, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I see by the tab on my paper that my time has about expired, so I inclose you a money order for three dollars for another year, for I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER well worth the money. I would send you five dollars to go around the world, but I think you can do more good by staying at your post and pouring in the hot shot in the future as you hav in the past; but if you do go you can put me down for the book. So giv us all there is in it worth knowing. I would like a few of the seeds from that apple-tree that our great-grandmother Eve learned so much from; and if you could get a few from that other tree, they would enable a man to liv forever. I will plant them in this fertil valley of the Willamett, and see how they will flourish. As this is the first time I hav written to you, I will not make my letter too long. I wish you a pleasant voyage around the world, C. S. WILLIAMSON.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $1 to continue the paper. I wish I could add a "V" to help you on the trip, but I am poor and striving to keep the wolf (interest) from the door. Yet I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER. With only a few months' acquaintance, it has become like a dear old friend. I find great consolation in its honest truths. I must thank St. Anthony for my being led to investigate Liberalism, and thereby come to a knowledge of the truth. And I say spare him not. By all means keep him mad, and he will rival Ingersoll in making Infidels.

FISHERVILLE, KY., June 23. 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I notice in last week's paper that you intend to start on that long trip soon. Brother Bennett, I hope the good Liberal friends will giv some demonstration of their high esteem that I imagin they hav for you by giving you a magnificent send-off when the time for departure arrives. May the god of all nature protect and keep you from harm on the trip, and that you may return home in due time to family and friends is the hope of a sincere friend and well-wisher, T. M. GUNN.

WALLA WALLA, WASH. TER., May 30, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I see you hav concluded to go. I hav reserved my verdict, thinking you would act according to your own judgment. I read your letters from Europe with a great deal of interest, and am sure the coming ones will be as good, but I fear it is rather too heavy an undertaking for you. I would much prefer you to make a circuit of these United States, giving our own little valley a friendly call, that we might hav the pleasure of seeing your benign countenance.

When you start on that long and perilous journey many a true and sincere heart will follow you over the sea. Mine will be one among the band. Yes, my dear old friend, I wish thee a pleasant trip and a speedy and safe return.

I received the pamphlets. Accept thanks. The "Besant-Hatchard Debate" is a splendid missionary work. I hav been trying to revive our old League. I am working up some subscribers for THE TRUUH SEEKER. Yours fraternally, WILLIS MCDANNALD.

DURAND, ILL., July 16, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Here I come at the eleventh hour with my "V." I could not resist the temptation of investing that much in the round-the-world fund and of enjoying the luxury of reading the books which you will be capable of writing if nature permits you to complete the trip. May good spirits ever attend you to guard and guide! If you should be taken out of the physical form before getting round, I hope you may find a medium through whom you can giv us your best thoughts. I would suggest that provision be made for the bestowal of the funds or any remaining portion of them in case of your death before completing the work upon THE TRUTH SEEKER and Mrs. Bennett. No doubt that has been thought of and provided for, but, as I had not seen the matter mentioned, I thought I would mention it. I inclose $2 with the $5, which please hand to T. C. Leland for annual membership in the National Liberal League for myself and a neighbor. I will put the names on a separate slip.

Fraternally, E. R. EVANS.

LYNN, MASS., July 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed in this registered letter find $5 to help send you round the world and to secure an interest in the forthcoming volumes. I hav the fullest confidence in your manliness and bravery to show up priestcraft and all the shams that hav been palmed upon humanity in the missionary reports. With your eyes wide open, ears extended, and your noble, free soul unfettered, I expect a new edition of revised religion—truth, golden and pure, rescued from degraded and debauched Christianity. I hope to be one among the half million true men and women to welcome you back to the home of freedom and to put a crown upon your head. May health, happiness, pleasure, and profit be the flowers in your path! Yours, etc., D. CORKEN.

FARMER CITY, ILL., July 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed I send you draft for $5 to send you round the world, with best wishes and hopes that you may return safe and sound, all the better prepared for many long years of good work in the cause of freedom. Yours fraternally,

D. W. SMITH.

Editorial Notes.

When We Start.

We will depart from this port on the steamer Ethiopia, of the Anchor line, bound for Glasgow, at eight o'clock in the morning of Saturday the 30th inst. Those who wish to see us off and bid us the final "good-bye" had better be on hand fifteen minutes before eight, as the steamer leaves promptly on time. It lies at Pier 20, North River, at the foot of Dey street. We will be pleased to take a final hand-shake on that occasion with our numerous friends. A few words of farewell to all our friends will appear in our next.

THE fourth instalment of Mr. Wakeman's review of Parton's "Life of Voltaire," intended to accompany the quotations from Parton's "Voltaire," on another page, was unavoidably crowded out of this issue. It will appear in our next.

Life-Size Lithograph.

By particular request we hav been getting up a life-size lithograph of ourselvs, on heavy plate paper, 20 by 28 inches. They are said to be good reflections of the original, and may be framed, or used without frame. Mailed to any address for 50 cts.

Show Bill for The Truth Seeker.

We hav gotten up a pretty show-bill for those who wish to act as agents of this paper; and they will be sent free to those who wish them. Sample copies will also be mailed to those who wish to use them in obtaining new subscribers. It is hoped that within the next few months the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER may be largely increased.

What Objections to Christianity?—The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

It will be seen that this lengthy discussion is concluded in the present issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It will soon appear in book form, making a volume of nearly a thousand pages, with an index. In quantity of matter it is the largest discusssion upon Christianity upon record, and by many is pronounced to be one of ability. The whole in a fat, neat volume will be mailed for $1.50. Those who wish a copy are requested to send their orders in early. The price is low for the quantity of reading-matter furnished.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining counties will be held on the Fair Ground, at Lawrence, Michigan, on Saturday and Sunday, August 6th and 7th, 1881, commencing at three o'clock P. M. Sunday morning session at 10:30, afternoon at 2 o'clock.

A. B. French, of Clyde, Ohio, and Mrs. Mary C. Gale, of Lansing, Mich., are engaged as speakers. The election of officers will take place on Sunday, and a special railroad train will be run from Lawton at excursion rates. An admission fee of ten cents for each adult will be taken at the gate on Sunday.

AN INFIDEL ABROAD. D. M. Bennett's letters from Europe. $1.50.

The Temple of Science.

BY A. E. DE FRIESE.

[Suggested by a series of lectures on Evolution by Prof. Edward S. Morse, and dedicated to American scientists.]

Higher! still higher! up, up let it rear,
Raising its sun-crowned head toward a clear sky;
Build up the temple of science, nor fear
That ever this temple in ruin shall lie;
Firm its foundation built on the strong rock
Quarried from ages and grown out of time,
Higher! still higher! nor fear the rude shock
Of tempest and storm to this structure sublime.

Higher! still higher! it's dome glit'ring with stars
Set like bright gems in the crown of a Jove;
Higher than Mercury, Venus, and Mars,
Pointing its spire to the calm blue above.
Courage! ye artisans, higher it grows;
Mount to the pinnacle ye shall uprear.
Steady! the hight is but dizzy to those
Who look down faint-hearted in trembling and fear.

Higher! the centuries shall help you to build,
Nor fear from the summit that ye shall be hurled;
Higher! until the great plan is fulfilled
Of the architect who has builded the world;
With the glance of the universe over you thrown
Rear the temple of science yet higher and higher,
That the on-coming future may see its grand dome
And æons advancing behold its bright spire.

For in its harmonious beauty sublime,
Which all incongruity sternly forbids,
This temple shall stand when, ah, when rasping time
Has made limature of the great pyramids,
And pilgrims of progress shall kneel at its shrine,
And low at its altar its power confess,
With truth its high priest, and knowledge divine,
Far swinging its censer all mankind to bless!

Things I Learn.

BY C. P. DARLINGTON.

Some things I learn as I older grow
I did not know when young;
I learn that I ought to be very slow
To speak with reproving tongue.

I learn that I liv in a house of glass,
And it isn't safe, I hav found,
To hurl at my neighbors as they pass
Rough words that may rebound.

I find that I cannot safely tell
By the dress or outward show
If a mean or noble soul may dwell
In a vesture fashioned so.

I learn that in every human heart
Some lovely treasures hide!
And for me it is the wiser part
To seek the angel side.

I learn to look with less of awe
On men of mighty name,
And mark how gilding hides the flaw,
And honor covers blame.

I learn that little deeds of good
We are not apt to count
May in the column of a life
Sum up a grand amount.

I learn how much I only guess
That once I thought I knew;
What old beliefs I now confess
Are only partly true.

I learn my riches lie in this:
A happy frame of mind;
That nought secures this state of bliss
But love of all my kind.

I learn, how many things I learn
That make my spirit bow!
And unto him with reverence turn,
From whom all good must flow.

I learn that wisdom now consists
In following nature's guide,
Which by making laws for men,
In law herself abides.

I learn how fraught with care and pain
A wicked act became,
By all good men 'tis shunned alike,
With no reward but shame.

Jezebel and Elijah.

BY ALHAZA.

You humbly knelt to him, Oh, I am dying;
What is our throne, its purple and its gold?
Gilead might rend its rocks to shield the robber,
With elfin hair and filthy mantle fold.

And I would scorn him, how he quails before me,
And sought deep cavern and wild, rocky plain.
Yes, I will teach him to believe in silence
If he invade our silken gloom again.

I had planned glories for this sordid people,
And Baal's priests were steeped in nature's lore;
But dark Jehovah's mocking, warlike hirelings
Smote with vile tongue our beauteous temple door.

As a mild, courtly train was issuing from it,
Breathing sweet words to sooth the soul's desire,
These ruffians drove them from its peaceful precincts,
Raving of vengeance and a God of fire.

Think for a moment of the scene on Carmel,
When its sweet flowers were bathed in priestly blood;
And now Elijah is the god you worship,
It was for this he poured the crimson flood.

Oh, how he gloated o'er the failing harvest,
The famished flocks awoke his fiendish mirth.
He and his god must rule 'mid fire and carnage,
'Mid earthquake and the direst woes of earth.

He knows the virtue of a sheepskin mantle,
And Naboth's kennel by your princely gate,
Served him with anger to inflame the people
Till words of mine had sealed the villain's fate.

And thou in arms hath shone proud, noble, kingly,
Forgiving, too, as Baal's priests hav taught;
This pair of Jewish gods will work our ruin,
They know deep spells and fiendish tricks hav wrought.

But I would rule with honest pride and power,
Nor cheat the people with a loathsome lie.
Till Baal calls I will maintain my splendor,
Nor will I bow my queenly head to die.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.
The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. Price, $1.50. Sold by D. M. BENNETT,

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."
This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last" I have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. CPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.

Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a luuatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet today what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.

Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

[Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.]

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfulls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.

Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.

Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I s houldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.

Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.

Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.

Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,

MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.

I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a bet r appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel be ter, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,

MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav suffered from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.

I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,

C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examiniug the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no pheuomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

THE FAR-FAMED "WILSONIA."

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.

Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA"

I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as you DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.

God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.

Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME,

FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.

I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physica Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complain in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS. Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

I SAID in my heart, concerning the estates of the sins of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselvs are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust and all turn to dust again. —Ecclesiastes iii, 18-20.

THE world of evil! There is no necessity for describing it; there is no ability to describe it; it is open to as all; it is the mystery that perplexes us all. Poverty, sickness, misery, defeat—we know what it is only too well. But here is the point, that evil is necessary, a necessary element in the progress of the race. There is no progress without pain—physical pain, moral, social, personal. It is the spear driven into the sides of humanity to make it march. Men are slow and apathetic; they love their comfort better than they do their good. On the edge of volcanoes they go to sleep. Unless necessity swoops down upon them with the whip of scorpions, they will not bestir themselvs to mend their lot.—Frothingham's Corner-Stone.

AND thou grim power [death], by life abhorred,
While life a pleasure can afford,
Oh, hear a wretch's prayer!
No more I shrink appalled, afraid,
I court, I beg thy friendly aid
To close this scene of care!
When shall my soul in silent peace
Resign life's joyless day;
My weary heart its throbbing cease,
Cold moldering in the clay?
No fear more, no tear more,
To stain my lifeless face,
Enclasped and grasped
Within thy cold embrace! —Burns.

HOW the will can possibly be free must remain to us, under the present limitation of our faculties, wholly incomprehensible. We are unable to conceive an absolute commencement; we cannot, herefore, conceive a free volition. A determination by motivs cannot, to our understandings, escape from necessitation. Nay, were we even to admit as true what we cannot think as possible, still the doctrin of a motiviess volition would be only casualism and the free acts of an indifferent are, morally and rationally, as worthless as pre-ordained passions of a determined will. How, therefore, I repeat, moral liberty is possible in man or God we are utterly unable, speculativly, to understand.—Sir W. Hamilton.

I HAV known men in whom the reasoning organs were amply developed and well cultivated who assured me that they could not reach the conviction of the being of a God. I hav known such men equal in point of integrity and practical benevolence to the most orthodox believers.—George Combe.

A BELIEF does not necessarily make a man any better. The devils believe and tremble. Some men are uninfluenced by the noblest creeds, though they assent to them; some are uninjured by the lowest and basest.—Dr. J. F. Clarke.

IN withholding the scriptures from the people, and shutting off philosophy entirely from the things that belong to faith, the church of Rome occupies a strong and impregnable position; for, if there be no reading there will be no inquiring; and if there be no inquiring there will be no doubt; and if there be no doubt there will be no disbelief.—Dr. Maudsley.

HE that kills for a faith must be weak; he that dies for a faith must be strong.—Maurice.

IT is useless trying to believe without any perception of evidence (Martineau). The method of science is the common sense method of cautiously weighing evidence and withholding judgment when evidence is not forthcoming.—John Fiske.

THE term Atheist conveys such terrible associations to almost all minds that there is perhaps no reproach from which men shrink more; and yet it has been freely applied by the zealous of all ages to those whose notions of the invisible powers differed from their own. The imputation is the most damaging that can be made, and it requires only a little ingenuity to make out a case of constructiv Atheism from any set of opinions at all differing from the common. Thus the ancient Greeks accused some of their philosophers of Atheism, though they did not deny the existence of a divinity, but only rejected the common notions of a plurality of gods. And in the Christian church, after the doctrin of the Trinity had been fixed and defined, those that denied the divinity of Christ were not unusually branded as Atheists.—Chamber's Encyclopedia.

"IT is better to hav loved and lost than never to hav loved at all." Even if love now and then turns to hate, this is no reason why we should never love. Because so many eat too much, or eat food that is pernicious and poisonous, is no reason why we should all cease to eat. Because married love leads to sexual intemperance is no reason why marriages should cease, but it is a reason why the great question should be discussed and true temperance be taught to one and all. Because so many are unfit morally, physically, and mentally to become parents is no reason why none should do so. And in my view, those who practice celibacy from a consciousness of bodily unfitness or other physical or mental causes are far more worthy of praise than are those who refrain from the selfish desire of being made fit for "redemption." (From what?) As to "rising above" the pleasure derived from the glance of the eye, the warm pressure of lips or hand, I confess I nav no desire to do so. Though less demonstrativ than most of my sex, I confess to a real pleasure in the enjoyment of the loves, friendships, and genialities of free, spontaneous, cheerful, and social intercourse. A dance or a game of croquet is to me far more enjoyable in a mixed crowd than one of all women. We must learn to be temperate without being ascetic, loving without being sensually amativ, and cordial and true without being over demonstrativ and excessivly effusiv.— Elmina D Slenker.

"THERE is no disgrace in being poor," we are told, and we're howling glad of it, for there are enough other disadvantages about it, without that one.

IN the old Puritan times a young man caught waiting at the church door to see his girl home would hav been set down as one shade worse than a sheep-stealer.

HE had been telling her stories of himself, and had done a great amount of bragging. When he had finished she kissed him and murmured, "This is a kiss for a blow."

A RHODE ISLAND clergyman was given permission to sing "The Sweet By and By" in an insane asylum. Many patients were moved. So was the clergyman. A lunatic moved him clear down stairs.

THE difficulty originated in this way. Said Gallagher to Ragbag, "I heard a story just now that was comical enough to make a jackass laugh. Let me tell it." "Don't you slur me in any such remark as that," roared Ragbag angrily.

A CONUNDRUM: "What is the difference between a man going to Plymouth church and a lover about to propose?" asks the Boston Courier. Don't know.—Boston Post. Then you had better go back to school. One is going to see Beecher and the other, to beseech her.

"MATRIMONY, young man," remarked old Metaphysics, "matrimony is an arrangment whereby a woman strives to swamp the giant intellect of a man by insisting that he shall go 'shopping' with her at least twice a week, and the result is she swamps his pocket-book."

"HI! where did you get them trousers?" asked an Irishman of a man who happened to be passing with a remarkably short pair of trousers. "I got them where they grew," was the indignant reply. "Then, by my conscience," said Pat, "you've pulled them a year too soon."

THE pecuniary incentiv for a youth to apply his mind to study in order that he may become a man of great scholastic attainments cannot be over-estimated. The salary of the average editor is about $2,000 a year, while the jockey who rode Iroquois was paid $5,000 for the race.

IT was their first night aboard the steamer. "At last," he said tenderly, "we are all one, out upon the deep waters of the dark blue sea, and your heart will always beat for me as it has beat in the past?" "My heart's all right," she answered languidly, "but my stomach feels awful."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Jesse Way, of Wabash, Ind., eloped with his daughter-in-law.

THE Ultramontane Spanish papers are abusing King Alfonso for his friendliness to the Jews.

ONLY five of the one hundred and twenty-five young men graduated this year at Yale propose to enter the ministry. The indication is a hopeful one.

THE story about a contemplated assassination of Rutherford B. Hayes on the day of his inauguration sounds very fishy. Not even a lunatic would think of assassinating such a man.

IN Great Britain more persons were killed during last year by horses than by all the railways of the United Kingdom. The number of violent deaths registered, from all causes, reached 23,000.

SARAH BERNHARDT, who always has a keen eye to the future, has already arranged her tomb at Pere la Chaise. It is of black marble, under a canopy, with a huge "Bernhardt" on it. It is much better to do this sort of thing during life, as survivors may not take nearly as much interest in the matter.

THE friends of Mr. Bradlaugh held an immense meeting, at which he spoke, on August 2d, in Trafalgar square, for the purpose of solemnly insisting on the enforcement of the law relating to the representation of the people, and of protesting against the illegal exclusion, by mere physical force, of a duly elected member of Parliament.

GRIEF and joy sometimes hav the same effect. A French newspaper relates that a millionaire lost his entire fortune, except about 100,000 francs, and died of grief within twenty-four hours. His brother, who was his sole heir, had long struggled in poverty, and now, on the sudden receipt of what he regarded as a large fortune, has just died of joy.

"CAN Chinamen be saved?" is a question propounded by Bishop Scott. His answer is that he thinks "their souls can liv." What a relief it must be to China to know upon such unquestioned spiritual authority that their souls will not perish in everlasting hell or something of that kind if they will only do as Bishop Scott tells them to! Who is Bishop Scott?

THE finger of God was plainly to be seen in the storm that visited Dallas, Tex., on the 1st of July. The domicil of an Infidel friend of ours is old and shaky, and apparently ready to tumble down, at any time, of its own accord; but it still stands. A fine new church was leveled to the ground, and two innocent ladies were severely injured by its fall.—Agnostic.

THE Rev. Mr. Whitcher, of Providence, it is found, not only obtained books fraudulently from the libraries and sold them after lying about them, but he also stole a large number from the bookstores of Boston. It is not strange that the brethren deem it best for him to stop preaching for a while. But it is to be regretted, perhaps, that the cause of Christ is thus to suffer with a laborer less in the vinyard.

IT is estimated that nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds of paper is produced annually, one-half of which is used for printing, a sixth for writing, and the remainder is coarse paper for packing and other purposes. The United States alone produces yearly 200,000 tons of paper, averaging 17 pounds per head for its population. The Englishman comes next, with about 12 pounds per head; the educated German takes 8 pounds, the Frenchman 7 pounds; while the Italian, Spaniard, and Russian take respectivly 3 pounds, 1¼ pounds, and 1 pound annually, the consumption of paper being roughly in proportion to the education and intellectual and political activity of the people.

REFERRING to the seclusion into which Nihilism has thrown the German and Russian emperors and Prince Bismarck, the London Economist says: "Half the world is governed by men whom their subjects rarely see. No one in China outside of Pekin and a small desert district ever see the emperor. Not one nativ in a million has ever seen a viceroy of India. The czar is not personally known outside of his capitals."

THE Rev. Henry Highland Garnett, Minister to Liberia, tells of an incident that came under his observation when a boy. He was watching a procession in which was carried a banner on which was represented Washington and Jackson ascending into the clouds. "Why, I didn't know that Jackson was a Christian," said a gamin. "How can he get to heaven?" "No, I guess he ain't a Christian," said another, "but then if Jackson makes up his mind to go to heaven, he'll go there, by the Eternal!"

A DISPATCH from Geneva says: "A great earth slip is in progress near Sigriswell, in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, above the Lake of Thun. A stretch of land on which are meadows and houses is gradually slipping down toward the lake. Thirteen hundred sheep with their shepherds hav been overwhelmed by an avalanche near Brigels in the Canton of Grisons." There are many places among the Alps where it looks as though several little houses might easily be jarred down the mountain side and dashed pell-mell into the valley below.

A PASTOR of three churches at a well-known watering-place in the Welsh diocese of Bangor, by himself or agents, rents and works a salmon fishery, is tenant of a large farm, a coal merchant, a team owner and general carrier, a car proprietor, a private road contractor, a stage coach proprietor (in conjunction with a railway company), a chief partner in public baths and mineral wells, a holder of turnpike gates, a lodging-house keeper, a guardian of the poor, and a member of the sanitary authority. This clergyman is more useful than the common run.

THE printers of Vienna propose to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the introduction of Guttenburg's art in that city in a manner befitting so memorable an event. An illustrated book, prepared in the best style of the printer's craft, and treating of the history of the art in the Austrian capital from its infancy, is to be one feature of the celebration. Another will be an exposition of all the inventions and improvements made during the gradual development of printing. Twenty prominent printers and publishers of Paris will attend the festivities, and all the leading cities of Europe are expected to send representativs.

IT is not an uncommon custom among the churches to make up a purse for their minister and send him abroad. The Liberals of this country hav been raising a fund to send Mr. D. M. Bennett, the Liberal editor, around the world. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to the number of over 600, hav contributed over $3,000 for the purpose, and Mr. Bennett will start on his voyage early this month. The proposition originated with some of Mr. Bennett's readers, and, in view of his unjust imprisonment by the Vice Society for one year at Albany, the suggestion was taken up with enthusiasm and the veteran editor will, no doubt, hav a good time at the expense of his generous constituents, in return for which Mr. Bennett will giv them a narrativ written in his characteristically vigorous style of all that he sees and hears.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

PROF. BARRET tells in Nature the story of a family in Derbyshire, every member of which is able to read thoughts committed to paper without seeing the paper, or touching or even seeing the writer. A scientific committee is about to investigate the facts, or alleged facts, for which he answers. The family is that of a Nonconformist minister, the Rev. Mr. Creery, of Buxton. He answers for it that there is neither deception nor conjuring; the children do get "intuitions," which enable them—how they do not know—to guess what other people are thinking about. Meanwhile the savants who hav hitherto investigated what is called mind-reading declare it to be simply muscle-reading. Few people can so control their muscles as to hide the facts which an intelligent "reader" wishes to discover. It is interesting to remember in this connection that the most impassiv of modern statesmen, whose face was a mask, could not prevent himself from revealing emotion in the twitching of his hands.

THE question is asked with some degree of anxiety as to what the gentlemen who hav exculpated Bro. Cowley would consider sufficiently criminal in a clergyman to call for ecclesiastical action. They say that his conduct toward little Louis Victor "does seem to convict Mr. Cowley of most atrocious cruelty." And they find that he was not so prompt as he might hav been in procuring medical assistance during the three months of the poor little fellow's starvation. But they find that there hav been miscalculations as to the quantity of beans served in the children's soup. They think there were more beans than has been generally supposed. That the supply of milk was inadequate is freely admitted by the committee, and it is also stated that Cowley had a rare gift for creating difficulties and making enemies. Nevertheless, they declare the exshepherd to be free from crime and immorality. Therefore it is that they decline to recommend ecclesiastical proceedings against Bro. Cowley.

IT is unpleasant to read of the fierce church quarrel that agitates the sweet hamlet of Honeytown, in the state of Ohio. It is all on account of a young woman. She was elected superintendent of the Sunday-school of the place, and there is no evidence to show that she was not thoroughly capable of running that school. But the Rev. D. W. Bair, an exhorter, took even stronger grounds than St. Paul, and held that women should keep silence, not only in church, but in Sunday-school. So strongly impressed was he with this idea that he headed a faction of like-minded men, and on Sunday last endeavored to force his opinions upon the female superintendent and her friends. The result, we regret to say, was a very bitter quarrel—the ungodly called it a row—which resulted in the arrest of the Rev. Mr. Bair and in his being bound over to keep the peace. The young woman is triumphant, but yet great injury has been done to the Sunday-school cause in the vicinity of Honeytown, Ohio.

THE Hindoo idea of hell is different from those set forth in the Confession of Faith and creeds of most of the denominations of Christianity. Punishments for the most part are in the way of transformations into unpleasant creatures. Those who hav been drunkards on earth are in the next world changed into frogs. This ought to be regarded as an improvement rather than a punishment, for the frog is a cold water animal of commendable habits, and never goes staggering around with a red nose or a bloated face. Dissenters from the true faith are turned into snakes. Backbiters are changed to tortoises, and misers to cranes, which seems infelicitous, as the crane is one of the few creatures that can conveniently bite its own back, and the tortoise, with its ability for shutting up, would serve as a fit emblem of the miser's strong box. Flesh eaters are to be eagles; thieves are to be deprived of the power of hearing, and debtors are to be bullocks. The last transmogrification probably has reference to the way in which poor debtors are sometimes slaughtered by their creditors in the present life. The Hindoo hell does not include the notions of brimstone and continuous combustion.

THE New York Herald has published an alleged interview with Leo Hartmann, who planned the blowing up of the Russian czar. Truth and other papers say Hartmann is not in America, but that the interview is a hoax. In the presence of the unknown all hav an equal right to guess.

THE London Observer says, in the event of Mr. Bradlaugh resisting the authority of the seargent-at-arms, who will bar his entrance to the House of Commons, he will be taken into custody. The sergeant-at-arms will then inform the speaker of the arrest, when the latter will take the pleasure of the House in respect to subsequent procedure.

INFERNAL machines hav been found concealed on board British steamers. The Fenians are pointed out as culprits. O'Donavan Rossa, an Irish agitator of this city, says that a speculativ Fenian placed them there, and received ten thousand dollars from the British government for information concerning them, which he turned over to the Irish skirmishing fund.

A RIOT occurred in Rome recently during the removal of the remains of Pope Pius IX. from St. Peter's church to the church of St. Lawrence. Crowds of people met the cortege with hoots and howls, throwing mud and stones, and shouting, "Into the river with him!" "Death to the pope!" etc. It is said by a correspondent of a New York paper that the present Pope Leo XIII. cannot appear upon the streets of Rome except to be spat upon.

DR. NAGLE, Register of Vital Statistics in the city of New York, reports for the month of July 2,087 births, 735 marriages, 4,378 deaths, and 219 still-births, against 2,418 births, 618 marriages, 3,487 deaths, and 191 still-births in the same month of 1880. During the month of July the deaths from contagious diseases were as follows: Smallpox, 31; measles, 38; scarlet fever, 157; diphtheria, 203; croup, 58; whooping cough, 22; typhus fever, 34; typhoid fever, 36; cebro-spinal meningitis, 32, and malarial fevers, 52. Deaths from these diseases are in large increase over deaths from the same causes in 1880.

CHAPTER IV.

Suspended between two churches, the one of which I had to confess openly, the other secretly, daily witness of the hard quarrels of both parties, and how pride and hatred and egotism, more than forbearance and piety, were written on the banner of contending churches, I became, without knowing it, a hypocrit and doubter of both. The arguments with which each attacked the disputed doctrins of the other were more thoroughly weighed, sharper, and more effectiv than those with which they defended themselvs. This awakened in me suspicion of all doctrins of faith; only the newly attacked ones retained in my mind lasting worth. Yet I concealed my thoughts in order not to become an abhorrence to all.

So my spirit was early left to itself. In unoccupied hours God and his creation were the topic of my thoughts. The insanity of mankind with which they persecuted each other on account of changing opinion, or carried on war with one another on account of the title of their princes, was to me a horror. I became early aware of my hard fate, to be compelled to liv among beings who thought in all things differently from myself. I saw myself surrounded by barbarians or half-civilized, not yet much more humane than those at whose human sacrifices we shudder. If the old Celts, or the Brahmans, or the savages of the American plains made human sacrifices on the altars of their gods, were they more terrible in their doings than the modern Europeans, when they on the altar of their gods (and opinions are the gods of mortals), slaughter thousands of their brethren in pious zeal?

I lamented the cruelty of my time, and saw no means by which to make the general barbarism of nations disappear. The brutal nature of man is everywhere predominant. Food, sexual desires, and greediness for power are, as with every species of animals, the mightiest spurs to action, the sources of agreement and disagreement, the rising and falling of nations. Unselfish virtue, eternal right, and indestructible truth are more imagined than recognized and taken to heart. Their names resound in the school-rooms without always penetrating the being of the teacher. And he who with holy zeal would dare to profess them would soon become a laughing-stock for the bystanders, the victim of general insanity. That was thy fate, Jesus Christ, thou only, thou high one! Thou wast misapprehended by thy enemies, but still more by thy followers up to this day.

Yet altogeter too painful for me was the gloomy present. I longed for the nobler and more perfect. In life's period of sparkling fancy it could not be otherwise, but that I built for myself a more beautiful world, in which virtue, right, and truth embraced each other, and sensuality transplanted there its sweetest emotions.

CHAPTER V.

The ruins of the immense amphitheater at Nismes, the old magnificent monument of Roman grandeur, were my favorit retreat. When I walked through the high-arched corridors between the gray pillars, or looked down upon the grand ruins from the elevated attic, then it seemed to me as if the spirit of majestic antiquity embraced me, and pressed me lamenting to its bosom.

Here I loved to tarry, but never without melancholy. The remains of races long since perished became to me a book of history. This magnificent Roman work the hands of several nations hav repaired. The two half-crumbled towers upon the attic, solitary piled up masses of stone, without taste and sense of art, were erected by the conquerors of the Romans, the Goths. And the wooden huts below, in the wide arena, are the dwelling-places of poor day laborers and workers in factories of our day. What a change of time and its companions!

The cry for help of a female here under the arches one evening scared me out of my dream. It was already dusk in the corridors. I hurried down the steps from the second story, and perceived the form of a well-dressed female in the power of a mean, low fellow. The sound of my footsteps made the scoundrel timid. He disappeared between the pillars. A young girl with torn hair sat on a marble block, trembling and beside herself.

"Has any one injured you?" asked I.

She felt of her head. "He was a robber, sir; he has robbed me of my hair ornaments, some set hairpins of value, nothing else. I beg you take me under your protection. I am a stranger here. Curiosity led me away from mother and sister. They await me outside. That fellow was to conduct me back out of this wide labyrinth, and he led me into this remote place."

I offered her my arm. We stepped into the light. O Clementine!

She was a blossom of sixteen years, tender and beautifully grown. She walked beside me with fairy-like step. The loveliness, freshness, and spiritedness of her countenance was angelic, and her look full of innocence and love penetrated my inmost soul.

I lost myself in an agreeable confusion. Never before had I experienced such a feeling of admiration and confidence of unspeakable attraction and reverence. I was twenty-one years of age, and knew love only from the pictures of old poets and called it passionate friendship, unworthy of the name. Ah! it was certainly something else.

Love is the poetry of human nature. The feeling of beauty ennobles the low sensuality and elevates it to touch the spiritual; and the virtuous, independent spirit weds itself under the enchanting hue of loveliness to the earthly. So it is true that love makes the dust godlike and brings down the heavenly to the earth.

"You are a stranger?" stammered I.

"Certainly," answered she, "but it is in vain that we look for mother and sister. Do you know the house of Mr. Albertas? There we liv."

"I escort you there."

We turned about. What a change! The narrow, black streets of Nismes were no longer prison walls, but shining clouds, and the people moved liked shadows through them.

We did not speak. We reached home. The door was joyfully opened. The whole family crowded around us to welcome the loved lost one, who was still sought by servants sent in search of her. Then I heard under the thousands of caresses the name Clementine. She thanked me with few words and blushed; the same did all the rest. But I could not reply anything. I was asked my name; I named it, bowed, and left the company.

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

But if Jehovah represented the sun only in his attributes of light and life of the world, creator and sustainer of all, their idea of deity would hav been the sublimest in the world, and more adapted to the ideas in vogue among religious people of today. But as the darkness and gloom of winter and death are mixed or composed with it, they understood him to be the veritable king of terrors. The idea is the same as Chronos, Saturn, Baal, Moloch, El, Zeus, Jupiter, Siva, Maha, Deva, and Jehovah, who alternates as a benign and malefic being; hence the confusion as to which the sacrifices were really intended for.

Probably human sacrifice of children, especially the first-born, was customary among the Jews during most of the time they held sway in Palestine, and later on, than is generally thought.

There were as many names to this deity as there were sects, and each sect hated the others as unbelievers, but the most fanatic and violent were the Jews. All others were accursed and children of Belial in their estimation, and worthy of death. And if any other sect should prosper they beat their drums and sounded the alarm of war, prophesying destruction in the name of Jehovah, who could only be pacified by their extirpation. And as the Jehovah sect were most cruel and fanatic in persecuting in those days, so we find the believers in modern times of this deity ready to do the same. Some of their actions hav been recorded in the Old Testament, and it is not surprising that they are extolled as virtuous acts when we know that the priests were the authors of these books. Many of their learned men were aware of the truth and identity of these deities, hence we find many of the kings of Judah and Israel, Solomon especially, tolerating the worship of Chemosh, Milcom, Moloch, etc., and the Druidic groves were especially a feature of those times (1 Kings xi, 5, 9). Ahaz is said to hav sacrificed his son to them (2 Kings, xvi, 3); likewise Manasseh (2 Kings, xi, 30). Jephthah also sacrificed his daughter, and not one word of blame is laid to him, but it is rather held up as a meritorious example, and much in vogue at that time.

This bloodthirsty God later becomes the God of the Christians. ("And now, because ye hav done all these works, saith the Lord, and I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called you, but ye answered not."—Jer. vii, 13. "They hav built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor, The valley of the son of Hinnom, but, The valley of slaughter."—Jer. xix. 5, 6. "They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not."—Deut. xxxii, 17. "To overthrow their seed also among the nations, and to scatter them in the lands."—Ps. cvi, 27.) It is said that a huge brazen image of this Moloch, hollow, with the head of a bull, stood with arms extended to receive the children who were sacrificed to him. The idol was heated intensely, and the children then placed upon its arms, and slipped thence down into its interior, where they were in a very short time consumed. To drown the cries of these innocents and the wailings of the mothers the tabors were beaten loudly, hence the name of the place, Tophet (of the tabors). The valley of Hinnom (valley of weeping) was a noted place near the brook Cedron, into which flowed the blood of the slaughtered beasts in the temple. This brook was symbolic of Styx and (Gwillionary of the Druids) was also Gehenna, where the worms multiplied and the fires were never quenched, because the practice was continual.

It is claimed that one portion of this Jehovah sect were the first to abolish human sacrifice, but at a very late date. But as they are the authors of the Old Testament, and Chronicles of the kings of Israel, they took care to make the best side of the case their own. ("And the king went up into the house of the Lord, and all the men of Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem with him, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the people, both small and great: and he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant which was found in the house of the Lord." "And he slew all the priests of the high places that were there upon the altars, and burnt men's bones upon them, and returned to Jerusalem."—2 Kings, xxiii, 2, 20.) But they failed to entirely eliminate the traces that such practices were a part of Jehovah worship, as the first-born was his, and had to be redeemed later by an animal, who was sacrificed instead to him as the Destroyer who slew all the first-born in Egypt. "And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor." "For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselvs to-day to the Lord, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day." (Ex. xxxii, 27, 29).

The redemption of the first-born was a later idea, and the Paschal Lamb, and the heifer and yearling upon the feast of the Covenant were instituted about the time of Josiah or Hezekiah in accordance with it. And to confirm these changes, and to show authority for them, a pretense was made that the original book of the law had been found in the treasury of the temple, buried beneath the accumulated treasures of ages,* by Hilkiah the priest.

As no one had ever heard of such a book before, not even a tradition of its existence, it is probable that it was an invention of Hilkiah and other reformers, who wished to elevate their religion to a higher standard. Upon this authority, therefore, the king proceeded to abolish all other sects in the land, and to make Jehovah worship supreme.

This was not the first attempt at suppressing human sacrifices, for we find in Ex. xiii, 12, 13 ("That thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord's. And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the first-born of man among thy children shalt thou redeem.") and Lev. xviii, 21; xx, 2, 5 ("And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord." "Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech, he shall surely be put to death; the people of the land shall stone him with stones.") a clause forbidding it. Though Micah does not refer to these passages, yet while arguing the inefficacy of sacrifice, he allows the claim of Jehovah to the first-born. ("Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I giv my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?"—Micah, vi, 7). Jeremiah denies that the Lord ever ordained or sanctioned these practices. ("For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices. But this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people; and walk ye in all the ways that I hav commanded you, that it may be well unto you."—Jer. vii, 22, 23). Ezekiel claims that he did, but it was as a punishment upon Israel. ("Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not liv. And I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am the Lord."—Ezek. xx, 25, 26). It is probable that the myth of a ram being substituted for Isaac was circulated at this period of reform.*

*The rule of the modern church is in healing. If any are sick call in the elders to anoint him with oil and to pray that he may be healed. One of the greatest sins an Israelitish king committed was to consult a physician instead of the priest of Jehovah. The worshipers of this god always believed that prayer was more efficacious in warding off pestilence than cleanliness and hygiene. The pope has insisted upon this rule in times of cholera and other epidemics. As an example of this let us cite the gathering of nearly 700,000 pilgrims annually upon the journey to Mecca, a body of the most filthy and ignorant people in the world, poisoning the atmosphere with the slaughter of nearly 2,000,000 of sheep, whose offal and entrails are left upon the grouud to rot under the blazing sun of that climate. Here is the grand starting-point of the cholera epidemic which periodically decimated Europe and Asia.

But as this solitary book of the law found in the temple was lost or destroyed (according to Ezra) at the time of the carrying away captiv into Babylon, it became necessary after a lapse of several score years to write out a new Pentateuch and book of the law. This was a grand opportunity to inaugurate a better system, and it probably was made use of, and the doubly so, as a long residence in Babylon had educated them to a higher conception of the sun-god and his attributes.

Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria assert that all the Jewish scriptures were destroyed at the time of the captivity and rewritten in the reign of Artaxerxes.

Refer to second book of Esdras, xiv, 21, 22. He complains thus, "Thy law was burnt, and no man knoweth the works which thou hast done." He then prays to be spiritualized, that he might recover, through inspiration, these lost writings—"If I hav found favor in thine eyes, let thy holy spirit descend upon me, and I will write all that has been done from the beginning, so that the people shall know the way, and it shall be for a guide forever."

Later we find how in a very curious manner he was inspired, how God called to him in the field and gave him a goblet of water like fire, which he drank, and was enabled to dictate for forty days to five scribes, who took down his words upon tablets of box-wood.

And upon this slim foundation the authority of the Old Testament stands; and every thinking Christian should read Ezra carefully to see how the Pentateuch's authority stands and what kind of a foundation it is for Christianity.

It is worthy of remark here that the number forty is chosen. Why? As it corresponds with forty years in the wilderness, forty days' fast, forty hours in the tomb; and in the Druidic bardism the logos is proclaimed forty hours after the sun's descent into the under-world.

The barbaric, ignorant, fanatical nature of the Jews proves that this God of vengeance and blood was better suited to them than any other conception of deity, and, as the author of the Bible, we find their ideas embodied in it, hence the scriptures are valueless for any idea of morality they contain, but they are an indication of the habits of those who compiled them. We find the gods who had been incarnated by the myth-makers ages previous adopted by them as their forefathers, and the gods and goddesses of the myths, and their actions compiled as veritable history.

In this enlightened age, what value can be attached to writings of authors who hav shown themselvs to be so childish and ignorant of natural law and phenomena, and of such immoral and brutish tendencies, and who wrote carelessly, if not wilfully deceiving the people of that age and ages long after? They assert that some of their ancestors saw God face to face, spoke to and heard him speak in a human voice; that he ate veal and cakes and melted butter like any other mortal with Abram; that the waters of the Red Sea and the Jordan piled up on either hand to make a path for their fathers through them; that more than two million people, with their cattle, etc., lived in the desert of Sinai a whole year; that an ass spoke to Balaam; that the sun and moon stood still at the command of Joshua; that Jonah, a Jew, lived in the belly of a fish three days and nights without oxygen; that three Jews were cast into a furnace and came forth unsinged, unhurt; that the world is six thousand years old, and four thousand years only hav elapsed since the repopulation of the earth commenced; that Noah, his family, and specimens of all the wild and domestic animals in existence were saved in an ark of less capacity than an ordinary ship of to-day, and that they had only one small window in the top for light and ventilation; that they floated at the mercy of winds and waves for twelve months; that there were only four men to clean up and dispose of the offal and refuse; that they lived thus, and no pestilence or suffering occurred aboard. To any person of common sense, knowing that these things are too demonstrable as absurdities, such assertions are ridiculous.

*It is true that a traitor to country and kin, a malicious murderer and an irreclaimable thief, was deemed worthy of death, and was deemed a fit subject to be cut off and returned to Abred to commence his progressiv course anew. Hence arose the idea that the Druids were guilty of sacrificing men. Occasionally they were burnt as a fiery baptism to purify them, water being deemed of no avail, and by their own requests to obtain Enaid vadhen (soul forgivness) and to mitigate their punishment in the future existence. The Bull's Eludd and Elgan were not deemed atoning sacrifices, but symbols of the sun's zodiacal positions. Eludd was killed, roasted, and eaten upon Christmas day with bread.

Official "Clap-Trap."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Governor Foster of Ohio has telegraphed each governor in the United States that as present indications almost assure us that the President will recover from the horrible attempt upon his life, it must occur to them and all that it would be most fitting for them and the governors of territories to issue proclamations setting apart a day for thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God for the blessed deliverance of our President, and for this evidence of his goodness to this nation, etc., etc.

If it were possible to believe Gov. Foster the simpleton that the letter of this telegram indicates, it would be positiv evidence that he was born at least one hundred years too late. If he does not believe it, then of course it has a purpose more evident in the spirit than the letter.

Does Gov. Foster imagin that any intelligent person believes that God had any special interest in the life or death of James A. Garfield any more than the humblest individual in this or any other land? Or that the physical and organic laws of mind and matter will be interfered with to either take him off or keep him with us? We think the Ohio governor too well posted in matters of science and every-day observation to believe the least particle of what his telegram in so many words affirms. As regards the attempted assassination there should be one universal feeling of regret, and in regard to the recovery of the President there can but be an equally universal and honest desire for his speedy restoration to health. If he gets well it will be the result of good nursing, a good constitution, and the simple fact that the wound did not reach one of the most vital parts. Had the ball lodged in the same part as did that sent by Wilkes Booth, Chester A. Arthur would hav been President ere this, despite the threat of another Ohio simpleton (Gen. Stedman). Where then would Gov. Foster's thankfulness come in? Would he then proclaim for a day in which all the pious could say, "Amen. Thy will be done?"

This kind of official cant was well enough when men in the mass did not think, and the few thinkers were made to feel the force of the rack and fagot, but in these days of liberated science and a "new version" such stuff is worse than folly. Men and women are asking to-day, "If God is saving the President, after such pain and anxiety, in order to show this would it not hav been as well to hav prevented the shooting, and, better still, to hav kept such an idea out of Guiteau's head, or, for instance, at some time during the two months that he was practicing to make sure of his mark, to hav given a sudden turn to the pistol and let the ball giv the assassin his quietus?" Some go even so far as to say perhaps God used this method to start the big subscription!

The plain truth is that all this religious clap-trap does more to bring the religion of the mind and heart into disrespect than all other influences. Think of it! God violating his own laws to save a servant of the people, and caring nothing for the hundreds and thousands that are continually passing from life through bodily destruction.

A very short time after the President was shot a large number of men, women, and children, while enjoying the festivities of the Fourth of July in Missouri, were slaughtered by wholesale through drinking a spurious lemonade made of some poisonous acid. Quite a number died, and a hundred others were in great bodily pain and danger. Where was God then? Where were the symathies and indignation of this great-hearted people? Echo answers, Where? Since then quite a number were killed by the caving in of a tunnel in Cincinnati, Ohio, and on the same day a mother and babe were killed by lightning. On the 15th inst. New Albany, Minn., and other places were wrecked and injured by a cyclone. Words flash from the East that one hundred men and girls were burnt in open day in a barn in Russia for simply refusing to work (for nothing, most likely). Now it strikes us that if God ever steps aside to save any person or persons, a little well-directed lightning on that brutal mob would hav been a cause for thankfulness on the part of those poor men and girls at least.

As Liberalists we are thankful that our teachings do not breed Guiteaus; such parties graduated from the other shops, and prove they take in just such stuff as Governor Foster sends by telegram.

We giv heed to the voice of reason, and avail ourselvs of every advance step in science, and every element of truth within our reach and comprehension.

The God we worship (if any) is in harmony with fixed and unalterable laws; in fact, is the law itself; and a man or woman who, whether through causes over which they hav or hav not control, falls in the line of their violation, must pay the extreme penalty, suffering more or less, longer or shorter, according to the constitutional character of his or her make-up.

Presidents are safe where Liberalism is tolerated for the simple reason that it teaches the largest liberty for each in equal and exact justice to all.

To say the least, this proffer of Gov. Foster is an insult to common sense; no, I beg pardon, it is in keeping with the sense that is much too common; it is, however, an insult to reason, and that of so flagrant a nature that we can but draw the inference that its object is to catch votes, and is nothing more nor less than political taffy to tickle and please the element that is fast losing their hold on the minds of the more intelligent, but who yet manage to control a large body of voters who through ignorance or folly cater to the last remnants of a dying superstition.

GEORGE LYNN.

The "Infidel Pulpit."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is quite refreshing to drop into Paine Hall on Sunday afternoon and listen to George Chainey. No one among the many Liberal lecturers since the days of Theodore Parker has touched the public heart so fully as the incumbent of the Infidel Pulpit. Since he began, the large Paine Hall has been filled every Sunday with eager listeners, and many of the same class hav had to turn away for want of standing-room in the door-ways. Even in these hottest days of summer, when the orthodox congregations hav wilted and gone to the sea-shore, large groups of people may be seen going into Paine Hall. The reader of the Infidel Pulpit cannot appreciate the enthusiasm of the hearers of the live Infidel talking in his pulpit. There is a warm sympathy existing between the speaker and his hearers, which every now and then breaks out into laughter or applause.

In the published lectures of the Rev. Blatherskite Cook, revised by himself, we hav all the demonstrations retained. All along through these lectures the sentences are interspersed with "applause," "great applause," "loud applause," and so on ad nauseam. On one occasion, when, according to his logic, he made it certain that a part of the human race must go to hades, his audience applauded. They were really glad that somebody had to go to—hades (new version). "Oh! what Modocs!" I inwardly exclaimed, and afterward never graced his audience with my agnostic presence.

It is a noticeable contrast between the representativ of liberty and the exponent of orthodoxy that one publishes to the world his own praise, and the other, more sensible, does not; that one gets hearty applause for hell-fire doctrin, and the other enthusiastic approval for his ringing notes of liberty for man, woman, and child. In fact, all of Mr. Chainey's lectures are battles for liberty. Science will save the race, but man must first hav liberty wherewith to gain science in his own way and in his own good time.

Liberty, humanity, science, and fellowship are the watch-words of all his lectures. In tearing away the rags of superstition the speaker never fails to point out the grand possibilities which lie in the future pathway of the race. The people who come to hear Mr. Chainey are of all shades of opinion, but in the one thing, liberty, they are a unit.

To a stranger in the city this audience presents a novel appearance. Many of the auditors sit reading newspapers for some twenty minutes before the lecture begins. Others are chatting sociably with one and another. Conspicuous among the newspapers that are read may be seen the Boston Investigator, which has thrown hot shot into the enemy's camp for more than fifty years.

Taken as a whole, the people here assembled do not look as if they knew anything whatever of the holy Sabbath day, and what is more, they do not seem to be a God-fearing people, but are nevertheless as attentiv and intelligent as any other audience in Boston, the Hub of the universe. The lecturer naturally draws this class about him, and from his auspicuous beginning bids fair to build a society which shall sustain him in his great work of lecturing to many thousands throughout the country. It is greatly encouraging to him and the many Liberals interested in his endeavors that his printed lectures in the Infidel Pulpit are greatly in demand, and that their circulation is steadily increasing from week to week.

A Parting Word.

DEAR FRIENDS AND READERS: My last hours in America for a year hav arrived. Even at this moment the boilers are being heated to make the power to take me from these loved shores. Before your eyes can fall upon these lines I will be more than a thousand miles away, upon the bosom of the broad Atlantic.

I leave my home on this long journey with feelings both of joy and of sorrow—joy, because so many dear friends all over the country hav wished me to go, because they hav kindly contributed the means to defray my expenses, and because I know I hav their esteem and their blessing; but sorrow at parting with my faithful little wife for so long a time, from my many friends, and my dear pet, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav from week to week communed with the thousands of my readers and patrons; I hav given you my honest thought, and my earnest wishes, and I hav day after day read the kind letters which many of you hav sent in to me, and I hav felt you breathing upon me true friendship, which has cheered me on in the labor I hav been performing and has sustained me when the shafts of malice hav been hurled at me. This inflow is for a time interrupted, and the communication between us must be temporarily deranged, but only temporarily. I shall feel that I hav your sympathy and that your remembrance and good desires will accompany me throughout all my weary journey around the planet on which we dwell.

I count myself most fortunate in the great number of warm and true friends whom I can claim and who are scattered all over this fair country of ours. The manner in which you hav sustained me for years in the feeble efforts I hav been making, and this enterprise in which I am now embarking—a tour around the world with the money sent in from the better part of a thousand friends—make me proud in the extreme. I call it a grand thing—a mark of true and trusting friendship.

Probably I will travel fully thirty thousand miles before any of you see me again, but I shall feel that you accompany me in spirit and memory, and this assurance will make me happy and joyous in the work I hav to perform, the same as your memory and sympathy cheered and sustained me when the walls of the prison confined me. I love you and thank you for your continued sympathy and friendship. I thank you for your support in the time of need and trial. I am sure no man in America has warmer and truer friends than myself, and no man appreciates friends and sympathy more than I do. May we ever be united in the bonds of fraternal esteem, and may good resolves to do our duty under all circumstances unceasingly nerve us on in the performance of the work that still lies before us!

I hope I may enjoy the long journey I am undertaking; but it is not exactly a protracted holiday I am to take. Much work lies before me, and many days and hours of close labor to perform. I shall not cut the wires which join us together, but shall send in the dispatches from the various parts of the world I visit with as much regularity as possible. I shall endeavor to keep you advised of what I see and meet with worthy of your attention, and I trust you will follow me in all my wanderings with some degree of interest.

I beg your forgivness for all the shortcomings and defects that I hav been guilty of. Many of you hav written letters to me which I wished to reply to, and intended to do so, but time seemed to be lacking. Many of you hav sent communications for my paper which I gladly would hav laid before my readers, but the want of room has been the great impediment. I crave your indulgent consideration for all this. "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak."

I commend, dear friends, to your kind consideration during my absence my faithful little wife, who will remain in THE TRUTH SEEKER office in my absence and do all she can to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER and its business in action; and also my trusted and worthy assistant, Eugene M. Macdonald, who will be editor and manager while I am away. I am sure both of these persons will be faithful in the performance of their duty, and send the bright, smiling TRUTH SEEKER to you every week freighted with the treasures of truth and reason. Yes, these will do their part faithfully, and it remains to be seen whether you will all do yours equally well. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large and expensiv paper, and its weekly bills are heavy. If all are faithful in making their remittances as subscriptions fall due, there is little doubt but that the paper will flourish; but if too many of you are careless and let the paper run on for months and months unpaid for, it necessarily produces hard times here at headquarters.

A large number of you are very prompt to remit for the paper when your subscription expires, while other large numbers of you seem perfectly content to let it run on. Month after month passes by, and even years of arrearages pile up. Even at this moment thousands of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are owing for the paper and hav been for many months. This inevitably causes hard times and great anxiety here. The paper costs so much to get out that it is vitally necessary that every person should pay for it promptly.

I was a good deal in debt, and these debts I hav been trying to pay off, so that while away the business need not be under the sheriff's charge. I will hav to take a good deal of money with me to meet the expenses of this long tour, so it is impossible for me to leave a large amount of money on hand in the treasury. But money will be needed every week to the tune of $250 at the very lowest estimation.

Friends, will you see that this sum is sent in? As a parting word may I request those who are in arrears to remit the same? You can all see when your subscription expires by noticing the tab on your papers, and if you will all keep the date ahead instead of letting it get way behind, happiness and joy will reign in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and it cannot fail. All, my friends, rests with you, and I believe the main part of you will perform your duty faithfully.

Those who send in orders for books also contribute to the prosperity of the business. Every book sold helps to meet the expenses. There are lots of books on hand here, and the world is suffering for the want of them. It is desirable that the world may speedily hav them and thus enable us to get up more.

Letters, money orders, etc., may be addressed to and made payable to myself as heretofore.

I will be glad while on my wearisome journey to receive letters from friends at home. Friendly letters always cheer me.

Till the 20th of September I may be addressed care of George Standring, No. 8 Finsbury st., London, E. C., England. For the two succeeding months care of Thomas Cook & Son's Tourists' office, Jerusalem, Palestine. Other directions will be given in time. I will let you hear from me often, and I will be glad to hear often from you.

And now, dear friends, I must say the sad words, "Good-bye." May nature's choicest blessings remain with you while I am away. May health, prosperity, serenity, and peace of mind be and abide with you now and evermore so long as life endures.

A hearty good-bye to each and every one of you.

Sincerely yours, D. M. BENNETT.

Off for Around the World.

Very few travelers hav had a more auspicious beginning to their journeyings than was vouchsafed to Mr. Bennett. The reception on the Sunday evening previous was enthusiastic, and the words of cheer and goodspeed spoken were warm and heart felt. The parting on the steamer was no less warm. The early hour at which the boat sailed precluded many from participating in the final farewell, but about forty friends were not to be deterred from a hearty shake of the hand and cheerful expressions of interest in the enterprise. Among those present we noticed Daniel E. Ryan, Dr. and Mrs. Kinget, T. C. Leland, Dr. Foote, Jr., Mrs. Briggs, Mrs. C. A. N. Smith, Miss Anna Knoop, E. C. Chamberlin, T. F. Leslie, Henry Stone, and many others whose names we would giv if we knew them.

The Ethiopia, of the Anchor line, is a stanch boat, with superior accomodations, and one end of her large saloon was crowded with those who had assembled. No formal or set speeches were indulged in, but the friends spoke that which came from their hearts, and which was more appreciated than any number of formal speeches. As early as half-past seven the assembling begun, and friends continued to arrive even after the lines were cast off and the gang-plank hauled ashore. We were proud to see among the number many prominent Liberals and some of New York's best citizens. When Mr. Bennett was espied coming down the pier he was hailed with joy, and walked aboard to hav his hand seized and shaken with a vigor that must hav made the muscles ache. After a little time was spent on deck the party adjourned to the saloon and devoted the short time remaining to congratulation over the success of the enterprise that is to giv us a true history of the world, and to regrets that in order to obtain it we shall hav to part for a time with one of the ablest and hardest-working of our leaders. Mr. Bridges came in for his share of kind words and goodspeeds. Although acquainted with him but one short week, we know that in him Mr. Bennett has a traveling companion who could not well be spared. The time seemed very short till the bell rang for "all ashore who are not going," and as the crowd moved slowly out from the saloon to the gang-plank the handshaking was repeated, and as many words said as could be crowded into the time. Reluctantly we left him, feeling that though his absence was a highly creditable one, and one which ought to make us rejoice, it was still hard to bear. Several times were the last words said, and it was not till the officers of the ship gently urged us all ashore that we left the deck for the pier, where all assembled to see the lines cast off and the vessel leave. As the engins started and the screw revolved, and the vessel walked out into the stream, we all went to the end of the pier. The two voyagers stood by the rail waving their adieux, and three cheers were proposed for Mr. Bennett and given with a vigor that made the steamboat officials on the dock open their eyes. Three more were given for Mr. Bridges, and as the echoes died away the ship went on out of hearing and the voyage was fairly begun. That its progress and completion may be as auspicious as its beginning is, we feel sure, the earnest wish of every friend and Liberal in the country.

Parton's Life of Voltaire.

IV.—L'INFAME AND ITS WAR WITH HUMANITY.

There is a touching passage on page 480 of Vol. II. which reveals in the aged Voltaire one real source of his power and the love that is still cherished for him.

A man and wife had done great harm to this village of workmen and were about to be arrested and punished. They came to the patriarch of Ferney, threw themselvs at his feet in despair, crying and protesting their repentance. M. de Voltaire was so much moved that he could not restrain his tears, and knelt himself to lift them up, saying to them: "Go upon your knees before God, and not before me, who am only a man. Away with you! I forgiv you! and do so no more."

The most distinguished man of Europe, the author, with the most prodigious reputation ever enjoyed by a man in his own lifetime, knelt to lift up the repentant and the despairing! This was the quality of his heart that made him stand as a bulwark between l'Infâme and the oppressed and its suffering victims, and right nobly did he in this way earn the lasting gratitude of all who love their kind. No chapters of his life will keep his memory greener than his conflicts with the inhumanities of The Infamous.

But we refer to the above incident to illustrate that the instinct of humanity was the primal motiv in Voltaire's heart. It is true that he exposed and sought redress for the cruelties and injustice of the Infamous as one effectiv means of crushing it. But the first impulse that moved him to this work of opposition was the impulse of love for his fellow-men. After years of contest in the Calas case, after he had aroused all Europe into indignation until the public opinion of the world compelled the French king and judges to do justice to the family of the murdered father, we find him writing thus:

"My dear brother, there is, then, justice upon the earth! There is, then, such a thing as humanity! Men are not all wicked rascals, as they say!

" . . . We shed tears of emotion, little Calas and I. My old eyes furnished as many as his. It is philosophy alone that has won the victory. When will it be able to crush all the heads of this hydra?"

Such were his real motivs. He espoused the cause of humanity against the Infamous from pure, noble, human motivs, and not from the love of opposition or of victory. Few passages in history or fiction can equal Mr. Parton's chapters on Voltaire's defense of the Calas family. Few, we believe, can read it without tears, ending in joy at his triumph. We thought to transfer the whole story to our columns, but space forbids; besides, that case is so famous that we take a shorter one, not so well known, that of Chevalier de la Barre, which will be found in our last issue.

It is only by reading case after case of this kind that we begin to realize the immense and priceless services that Voltaire rendered to human progress. It was indeed he who lifted Europe out of the dark ages. Their ignorance, stupidity, and cruelty remained embodied, not only in the church, but in the very laws of the state. There was no trial by jury, and torture and hearsay evidence made the law chiefly an instrument by which superstition, prejudice, and selfishness wreaked their vengeance both upon the innocent or guilty. No one was safe against an adroit accuser. Voltaire, in the interests of humanity, took up the fight against this whole system of legal outrage. He spent his time, labor, influence, and money without stint to expose its injustice and cruelty in case after case. So numerous were they that finally Mr. Parton tires of even enumerating them. He caused his royal pupils, the great Frederick of Prussia and the great Catharine of Russia, to abolish torture and to revise their criminal laws into something like justice and decency. His friends Turgot and Necker, in France, were sustained by the public opinion of Europe, which he had created in doing the same in France, though he did not quite liv to see full results. He made the Inquisition and the Calvinists ashamed of their cruelties, or, if not, he made them feel that the world looked upon them with shame and horror.

How could he do this? By bringing into the foreground a new power—the interests and feelings of Humanity as greater and more real than their petty gods and dogmas and imaginary salvation! He rose to the position of the prophet of the coming kingdom of Man. He would cry out in horror and indignation, so that all Europe must hear, when the innocent children of man were crushed and burned by the Infamous Monster. He insisted that torture, hearsay evidence, and blind laws under which these were allowed should come to an end. He insisted upon the safeness of toleration, and the inherent goodness of mankind, if treated with anything like fairness, decency, and justice. This has been the faith of every really great man who has ever lived. This spirit inspired the prayer with which he closes his history of the Calas case. It seems to us one the most exquisit "Positivist" prayers ever uttered. In it we see opened the very heart of Voltaire!

"May those who light candles at noon to celebrate thy worship tolerate those who are content with the light of thy sun. May those who cover their garments with white linen when they say that God ought to be loved not hold in detestation those who say the same thing in a mantle of black wool. May it be held equal to adore thee in a jargon formed of an ancient tongue, or in a jargon of more recent origin. May those whose coat has been dyed red or violet, who dominate over a little portion of the dirt of this world, and who possess some rounded fragments of a certain metal, enjoy without pride what they call grandeur and riches, and may others behold them without envy; for thou knowest that there is not in these vanities anything really enjoyable, nor anything worthy to swell with pride a human heart.

"May all men remember that they are brothers! May they hold in horror the tyranny exercised over souls! May they look with execration upon the brigandage which ravishes by force the fruits of labor and peaceful industry! If the scourge of war is unavoidable, let us not hate one another, let us not tear one another to pieces, in time of peace; and let us employ the moment of our existence in blessing equally, in a thousand different languages, from Siam to California, thy bounty which has given us that moment."

His life was the illustration and enforcement of this prayer. His estate at Ferney was called and became literally "a refuge for the oppressed." What shall we say of a "religion" that curses a man of whom Mr. Parton writes in this way?

"The patience, the skill, the tender, generous compassion, with which Voltaire labored, first, for the restoration of ruined families, and, afterward, for the reform of the criminal procedure which had unjustly condemned them, has never been equaled since man first became capable of pitying his fellow. In doing this high and great duty, he ennobled and purified himself; his later letters exhibit to us a better and broader man than those of his earlier years. The time will come when the twenty volumes of the writings of his old age will furnish texts, chapters, volumes, for the nourishment of humane principles in young and old. The lesson they teach is that injustice to any man wrongs and imperils every man, and that we should all feel it as if it had been dealt to ourselvs. With the utmost convenient brevity I will mention a few instances of his interference on behalf of those who came to implore the aid of the savior of Madam Calas and her children."

Let us now turn to another and a barely less important part of his services to his fellow men. He was a promoter of what may be called coöperativ industry.

He was one of the first to practically show how to protect the fruits of labor and peaceful industry, from brigandage and exploitation. He built over a hundred houses for refugee workmen at Ferney, and from them established a kind of coöperativ colony of watchmakers and weavers which was in all respects successful, and of which the good effects remained as late as 1824, and even to this day. It came about in this way:

In 1765, his neighbor, the little republic of Geneva, Calvin's Geneva, in a small way, rehearsed the French Revolution. The "noble council," the Bourgeois, and the common people ("nativs"), could not agree, or rather the latter would not agree to be robbed. Voltaire had lived among them before he established Ferney, and, when appealed to by the people, did all he could, by his inimitable tact, to reconcile their differences and to secure their rights. He failed because there were a few rascally nobles who, as he said, were "good for nothing but to be thrown into the lake."

The nativs, between the "nobler" factions, were wronged and exploited without stint. Voltaire said to them, "My friends, you are not unlike those little flying-fish which, out of the water, are eaten by birds of prey, or else when they plunge again into the water, are devoured by the larger fish."

He told them repeatedly in words they could not fully understand at first, but afterward realized, "If the hardness of your masters compels you to abandon your nativ country [Switzerland], then come to me."

They finally were compelled to come, but wondered what he could do with them or for them. He used them to found "a city in the desert," and soon made Geneva see what she had lost and what France and Voltaire had gained by their stupid injustice. The capital he advanced was easily repaid by the workmen, who became themselvs interested in the results of their own skill and labor. They formed a model village under their own laws and the guidance and protection of their benefactor. "He was adored by his colonists," we read, and it is hard to blame them for this kind of adoration. Life would hav been a sorry fate to most of them without him. The ways in which he introduced them and their watches and woven work to Europe are amusing enough. The pleasantry and poetry by which he obtained some great lady's shoe, so as to insure fitting stockings; the watch that went next to royalty itself as an advertisment, are instances of his tact. Never did a colony hav such a patron at home or such a "drummer" abroad. In a few years their wares went to every part of the civilized world. Their business success was indisputable. Nor less was their comfortable aad peaceful livelihood secure. They had been of different faiths, but they now dwelt together as brothers. We read:

"When a Catholic was sick, Protestants went to take care of him, and in their turn received from him the same assistance. It was the fruit of the principles of humanity which M. de Voltaire had inculcated in his works, and, particularly, in his treatis upon tolerance. He always said that men are brothers, and he proved it by facts."

Of course he was was greatly pleased with his success as the vindicator of the outraged, and as the protector of the refugees and colonists. But he never boasted of it, and had the most graceful ways of turning off the compliments that rained upon him. It was "philosophy alone" that had succored the victims of "the hydra," as we saw above in the case of Calas. But when Madame du Deffand exulted over the success of his colony he replied with inimitable irony, "All this I hav done from pure vanity. God, as we are assured, made all things for his own glory; we must imitate him as far as we can."

This was indeed one of the most wonderful of human beings! Think of how many nobles and men of greater wealth and power there were in Europe. But only this invalid, who sometimes scarcely left his bed for three days, felt and did the duty of ennobling, protecting, and vindicating Man as Man. This he did when all that success can giv in this world was his. "Who," said Herder when Goethe assumed charge of things at Weimar, "can withstand the disinterestedness of this man?" In our next we shall see who could do it, and why it was needful for Mr. Parton to write the life of this man before the dark night of detraction and oblivion had veiled him hopelessly from view. T. Book Notices.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE. Translated from the French of Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris. In paper covers, 75 cents; in cloth, $1.00; postage included.

We hav now in press this very interesting work. It contains a vivid account of the life of Voltaire during his exile from his nativ country, including the most interesting incidents of his life, with selections from his poems. The work had a great run in Paris and should hav here. Many orders are hoped for.

DESIGN IN NATURE. Replies to the Christian Guardian and Christian Advocate. By Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ontario. Price 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Mr. Pringle is a clear, able, and forcible writer, and those will bear witness who hav read the numerous articles he has written. In this little pamphlet he makes cogent replies to the unfair and canting criticism of two orthodox journals.

THE ANGEL OF HOREB. A critical review of Biblical Inspiration and Divinity. By M. B. Craven. Price 10 cents. Sold at this office.

Those who hav read the writings of Mr. Craven will not need to be told of the excellency and terseness of this style. He uses strong and convincing arguments, and knows how to place them to the best advantage and where they will tell the most effectivly.

"Elements of Social Science."

TO THE READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Hav you read the above work, published by D. M. Bennett? If you hav not, send for it at once and peruse one of the most profound, thoughtful, sincere, and valuable works ever written. It is a book which should be in the hands of every man and woman in America. A few days ago I first sent for a copy of it, not knowing anything of its scope and tendency, its absolute fidelity to nature, of its author and his fearless truth speaking. In due time I received the work. I set myself to a cursory inspection of its six hundred clearly-printed pages. But the "cursory inspection" turned out to be a careful reading of the entire book. It was almost impossible for me to lay down the work long enough to eat my meals until I had finished reading this most remarkable volume. No wonder that the "Elements of Social Science" has reached its eighteenth edition. This fact shows that there are at least a few thousand of men and women in England and America who know a good book when they see it. No work upon social science is calculated to do so much good as this. Suffering humanity is under an everlasting debt of gratitude to Bro. Bennett for its republication in this country. Let every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER send for it.

Hastily, but earnestly yours, E. C. WALKER.

A GOOD opportunity for the friends of Liberalism to help on the cause is now presented. Mr. Bennett's letters from around the world will be an extra inducement for people to subscribe. Many who are not yet fully free from church control will want to read them, and with them they will also get much Liberal reading that cannot fail to open their eyes. We hav an elegant poster in two colors, which will we mail free to all who write for them, and which will be a great aid to agents. The subscription list ought to double during the next year. No such opportunity of getting a truthful history of the world and so much Liberal reading matter was ever presented before. We hope everybody will take advantage of it.

IT is in order now to send for the Bennett-Mair discussion, "What Objections to Christianity?" The book is in press and will be out just as soon as we can get it. It makes nearly a thousand pages, and will be sold for the low price of $1.50. Mr. Mair is one of the ablest defenders of Christianity we ever read, but we think it must be conceded that all his points are more than fully met and overthrown by Mr. Bennett. Those who hav read it in the paper will want a copy for permanent preservation, and those who hav not will wish it to see what can be said for Christianity, and why the system is not one calculated to benefit mankind.

WE would call the attention of our friends to the excellent lithograph of the voyager around the world which we hav on hand. Many were not satisfied with the small photographs, and to accommodate those Mr. Bennett has been to considerable expense to prepare this excellent representation. It is life-size, on heavy paper, and will be mailed, secure against breakage, for 50 cents.

THE Liberal, of Liberal, Mo., has had to change to a monthly for lack of financial support. We are sorry to see the change, but it is a fact that Liberal papers are not supported as well as they ought to be considering the number of Freethinkers in the country. Mr. Walser says he has been running his little paper at a loss of from $800 to a $1,000 a year.

THE Miss Blood who married Lord Campbell in England is no relation to the notorious Victoria Woodhull, as at first reported. A nice little newspaper story is thus spoiled.

H. L. GREEN will lecture in Belvidere, N. Y., on Sunday, August 7th. Subject, "Christianity and Freethought contrasted."

COURTLANDT PALMER, ESQ., will read a paper at the Hornellsville Freethinkers' Convention entitled, "A Temple to Humanity."

"THE DARWINS" and "John's Way" are excellent books. M. E. BILLINGS.

Personal.

W. F. Jamieson has been speaking at Burr Oak, Michigan, and Orland, Indiana, and is advertised for Centerville and South Haven, Michigan. For grove meetings and lecture courses address him at Albion, Michigan.

FRIENDS AND LIBERALS: I hav received one of the "beautiful" pictures of our friend Bennett, and I like it so well I want them scattered in every home where our TRUTH SEEKER is read and loved. I feel as the pagans of old did when they had they their gods in their own houses.

I look up from my reading, writing, or sewing, and the mild, pleasant, and cheerful face of my deity is right before me. Mr. Slenker comes in and says, "Good morning, friend Bennett," and we all feel as if he was one of the family. I hav a great many pictured faces, but there is none that seems quite as near what I could worship as a god as this one of D. M. Bennett standing here on the mantle in its velvet frame. All the while he is going around the world he will be here also. Yes, I am proud of it, and I know you would be too if you had one just like it. It is by far the best one I hav seen of him. I always want to share my joys, and hence these few words to you. ELMINA.

THE RELATION OF ANCIENT EGYPTIAN CIVILIZATION TO THE HEBREW NARRATIVS IN GENESIS AND EXODUS, AND THE RELATIV CLAIMS OF MOSES AND THE PYRAMID TO INSPIRATION CONSIDERED.

BY PROF. VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

It is probable that the necessity of resurveying their lands every year, owing to the annual overflow of the Nile, imparted to the Egyptian mind a special impetus in mathematics like that which the necessity of filling our country with railroads imparts to us in railroad building. We can ascribe to them this special impetus in mathematics, and still remember that they were plowing the soil with two sticks fastened together by a cord, which, held in one position by the laborer, formed a hoe, and held in another position, with oxen to draw it, formed a plow. The arts were far more immature than they were in the subsequent epochs of Homer and of David, and the Egyptians of this period were engaged in commerce with the inhabitants of the lowermost cities which Schliemann has been uncovering beneath the site of ancient Troy, and with the earliest of the dwellers in the lake villages of Switzerland, for both these classes of far-off ancients are shown to hav been consuming the grains and using the rude manufactures of Egypt.

It is too early in the study of religious science to trace exactly the relation between Egyptian and Jewish ideas at this period. We are beset by the difficulty that our Jewish records, though written by people who knew little of Egypt, are written so clearly that we learn their errors easily. The Egyptian records, on the other hand, though written by those who knew whereof they wrote, are far earlier—before an alphabetic language like that of the Hebrews was possible—and hence they wrote their truths very obscurely. Hence it is infinitly easier to learn error from the Hebrews than to get at the truth from the Egyptians. Bunsen thought 20,000 years would hav been required to mature the Egyptian hieroglyphic language to the condition at which history opens in Egypt, viz., to that wherein the hieroglyphic language is disintegrating and giving way to the alphabetic. But Hebrew history opens with a race already possessed of an alphabetical language, and who never had a hieroglyphic one. So Hebrew history opens after the worship of one god had developed from polytheism. They seem never to hav passed through the earlier polytheistic stage. But Egypt went through the whole polytheistic career.

Hebrew life began after iron and brass were known; Egyptian long prior to those arts. In whatever ideas, therefore, the two races share, the Egyptians must hav been the teachers. Mr. Osborne, in "Monumental Egypt," tries to identify the Adam of the Hebrews with the ra-Athamah, a sun-god worshiped by the Egyptians of one of the cities of the delta—also the Noah of the Hebrews, with the Nu, or god of the floods, of the Egyptians. Some of the legends in Genesis are suggestiv of Egyptian origin. The word Adamah is plural, and signifies red men or race. The specification of an individual by his color indicates that those who so distinguish him are not of that color. The legend of Adam, therefore, concerned a red race, and must hav been first circulated among some people of a different color, either black, yellow, or white. The Egyptians were red.

Goldziher, in his "Mythology of the Hebrews," has treated the myths of Genesis with more philological research than any other author. He holds the story of Adam and Eve, Eden, Cain, and Abel to be a myth significant of the wicked triumph of agriculture (Cain) over the sinless pastoral or shepherd life (Abel). There existed between agricultural nations like Egypt, whose sacrifices were animal, a violent antagonism as to what virtue itself, or ethics or morals, arose from and consisted in. According to the shepherd idea, as men grew wealthy and luxurious through agriculture and its attendant commerce and manufactures, they diverged into rich and poor, bondmen and masters, and thus grew wiser and wickeder together. The agricultural races, on the other hand, became accustomed to buying the services of the poor, and to the idea—which is the true mercantil conception—that the morals of the poor are precarious and purchasable. What to the shepherd is the fall of man is to the economist the rise of man, and vice versa. Even to-day the poet idea is,

"When ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

But the scientific idea is that ignorance never is bliss nor was man ever better or wiser for being ignorant. Perhaps the ancients did not formulate their idea more clearly than do the millions to-day who hold that virtue resides in the rural districts and demoralization in cities; whereas, cities are the most intense form of every nation's life, of its virtues and vices alike. It is sufficient to know that mankind hav always fought over the question whether solitude or society, simple life or complex life, most promotes virtue. The Eden story attributes the higher virtue to the condition of pastoral simplicity, before men hav come to know good from evil to the extent that they learn it in the busy world—the populous Egypt of life, where industries are diversified and society is complex.

Let us descend a moment from the great pyramid, so expressiv of the endless toil and endeavor of restless civilization, to this pretty little story of Eden. It is described in Genesis as a land of delight or of pleasure, watered by a river. Hill countries are drained, not watered, by their rivers, but Egypt is watered by the Nile. It was, too, the land of the Adamah, of Adam, or the red race, and bears better evidence than any other country of being the land of Eve, or of the mother of both pastoral and agricultural life. The story says that "from thence," i. e., after watering this land of delight, the river parted into four streams. In no hill country can a river divide into four streams. It can only do that at its delta, where its continual deposits of sediment oblige it to form new exits because the old ones are flowing up hill. The name of the first river, says Genesis, is "Parting Asunder," that is it which runs through the whole land or district of the circle where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good; there are the precious stones and the cameo; and the name of the second river is "A Stream;" the same is that which courses through the whole land of burnt faces; and the name of the third river is "Swift Waters;" that is it which goeth toward the east of Asshur, the red hero, or the sun (whose Egyptian form was Osiris). The names of the first and third rivers, Pison and Hiddekel, hav a phallic interpretation, and suggest the sexual relation, Pison in its feminin and Hiddekel in its masculine aspect. The story then says, "and the fourth river is 'Sweet Waters'" (Euphrates). Here are three related meanings, the first is mystically sexual, the second may, in connection with the name Adam as the appellation of the red race, imply a geographical recognition of Egypt; the third is ethical and identifies Eden with the shepherd life of simplicity, where the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil had not at first been eaten. In brief, the legend says that in the beginning the red race found its perfect delight in love, in Egypt, and in the simplicity of the shepherd state. Then came the thirst for knowledge. The serpent, which in all mythological languages means time, taught this red race the knowledge of good and evil. How? Through the transition from the simple pastoral to the complex industrial life. Then this red race was driven out from the land of delight, and the curse of toil was laid on them. In the sweat of their brow should the red race, the Adamah, eat their bread, and Time himself, the serpent that tempted them, should, "like a wounded snake, drag his slow length along," accursed through the world.

Goldziher finds the names Cain and Abel, sons of Adam, are the same as the names Tubal Cain and Jabel, grandsons of Noah, and that in both cases they typify modes of industry. Cain is the agricultural industry, the sacrificer of the fruits of the earth, the builder of civilization, the destroyer of the shepherd race, accursed of God, the foe of man, because the introducer of wealth and of power. The legend as a whole, therefore, may tell the story of the transition of Egypt from that which the Jewish or Chaldean poet thought to be its Eden of early and simple delight to its epoch of soul-destroying civilization.

Far older, according to Goldziher, than the myth of Adam and Eve is the myth of Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar, which he traces through numerous languages. To apprehend this we must recall that element of the early shepherd life in Asia, for this myth is not Egyptian but Chaldaic, when the shepherd mind looked upon the night as its period of joy, for by day the hot sun blasted everything, made even the movement of flocks impossible, compelling them to cower in the shade or gather in the streams, while their owner shrank into his tent and longed for the return of the cool and benignant night sky, the blessed, reviving night winds, and the high and hallowed companionship of the night stars.

Only those who hav watched the myth-making process as it transforms the day sky into Zeus and his sister and wife, the atmosphere, into Juno; the sun into Hercules in one country, into Samson in another, and into William Tell in a third; the moon into Ion and Diana among the Greeks, and into Jonah among the Phœnicians and Jews, and who by patient study hav become satisfied that these transformations are part of the natural play of the poetic spirit in man, only such will be prepared to believe that Abraham is the high and starry night sky, whose offspring are not only as the stars for number, but they are the stars in mythical truth and verity; whose sister and wife, Sarah, is the wandering, the changing, the princess, the queen of heaven, the moon. The name Sarah is kindred to the name Astarte, under which the moon was worshiped throughout Asia. In every moon myth the moon is sister and wife of her lord, who is sometimes the day sky or sun, and sometimes the night sky. But she is always either absolutely virgin, as in Diana, or, if married, she is barren, except when in her old age, i. e., in setting, she has offspring, which offspring will generally be indicativ either of the flush which the moon casts upon the clouds in setting and rising or of the sun. The reason the moon is emblematic of barrenness or virginity is the correspondence between the monthly periods of the moon and those of the virgin or barren woman. The fact that the kings of Gerar and Egypt fell in love with Sarah in her old age indicates that these nations worshiped the moon nearer its setting or to the westward of the nations in which the myth assumed its Bible form. The offspring of Sarah is Yishak or Isaac, "the bright and laughing one," i. e., the sun. The setting moon is spoken of in the myths of many languages as giving birth to the rising sun. Hagar, the fleeing one, the pursued, the concubine of Abraham, the "deep night sky," represents the sun not on its bright and cheerful side as it is represented in Isaac, but in its burning and unfriendly aspects when it invades the shepherd's peace with withering power and blasts that which it has no power to bless. As the hot and scorching sun is to the calm night sky, and sweet but barren solace of the moon, so is the sudden and fruitful lust for Hagar, the fugitiv, to the faithful service of Sarah.

All these myths descend to us from a period near to that of the authors of the pyramids, and may revive in our minds the strong force with which astrological conceptions ruled the ancient mind. It is but recently that the astrological interpretation has been given to them. Max Müller, in his earlier writings, has declared that the Hebrew imagination was void of the myth-making spirit. Yet here we find a system of Hebrew mythology developed by a better Hebraist than Max Müller, which ranges the Hebrew legends of Genesis into a unique order, having a mystical fellowship with those of the Aryan races.

If these interpretations perform no better service, they at least unchain historical criticism and investigation from the galling fetters of an alleged infallible inspiration. They leave us free to perceive that the Hebrews, though they thought and talked much about Egypt, knew very little about it, and that little not correctly. They never knew the names by which the Egyptians called their own country, viz., Kem, or the black country. The Greeks knew Egypt by a name supposed to indicate a suburb of a city in the delta, viz., Aiguptos; and from the Greeks this name has come down to us. As if a schooner from Java, putting into the port of New York, might anchor at Jersey City, and in that way the Javans might come to know the United States of America by no other name than Jersey City. The Jews knew Egypt only by its Palestinian name of Milzraim. They knew the individual name of no king or Pharaoh of Egypt, neither of the one who promoted Joseph nor of him who opposed Moses. The Jews seem to hav carried out from Egypt and to hav adopted into the Hebrew language no proper names, no new words, no names of utensils, or even of places. From the Phœnicians they borrowed even the name of their god Vah-veh; from the Babylonians they borrowed his other name, El. But when they name places, towns, seas, or gods of Egypt, it is never with Egyptian names, but always with epithets to which the Khemites were strangers. They enter the country and leave it without discovering a solitary pyramid, or temple, or hieroglyph; the overflow of the Nile never disturbed their labors, nor did they ever pause in their brick-making to descant on its wondrous changes; to-day the red Nile, anon the white Nile, then suddenly the green and nauseous and deadly Nile, and anon the blue Nile. The Egyptian civilization, as seen by the Hebrews, inverted all the common qualities of human nature. Egyptian women of high rank fall in love with Jewish men of low degree, without regard to caste, modesty, religion, language, race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and make known their love in obscene places. An Egyptian general selects a man to preside over an important trust, apparently because his religion, language, and blood all unfit him to perform the trust acceptably. A nation having a tremendous and varied assortment of gods of its own, gets into a panic the moment the god of little Judea is mentioned. A Pharaoh's daughter goes wading around in the Nile after stray babies and bathing with her maids of honor as naturally as we might suppose that Queen Victoria and her daughters would go wading around in the Thames, while they left the duchess of Brunswick on the shore to watch their clothes. The kings of Egypt, like those of Babylon, are occupied in dreaming dreams for Jewish youths to interpret; Belshazzar is duplicated in the Pharaoh; Daniel is duplicated in Joseph and Moses; Babylon is duplicated in Egypt. The prophets are always prophesying in prison, and because of their prophecies are immediately made secretaries of state for foreign affairs. It is evidently the Babylonian story thrown backward into a more remote antiquity, and made the basis of a new novel, which is to giv dignity to the origin of the Jewish nation, just as Virgil wrote the Æneid to prove that Rome was settled by the fugitiv Trojans.

The Jews could never hav been captiv in Egypt and gone forth after several hundred years of residence there so utterly ignorant of Egypt as everything in the Old Testament shows them to hav been. I will not here enter upon an analysis of the criticisms which demonstrate that the Hebrew books called "of Moses" had no existence until about the period of Josiah or of David, seven centuries after the period assigned in them to Moses. This has been established from the books themselvs. What I now call attention to is the fact that Egyptian history never heard of Joseph, Moses, or the Jewish captivity, in any feature or circumstance.

Philip Smith, in his preface to Dr. Brugsch-Bey's "Egypt under the Pharaohs," says: "The position and precise office of Joseph, the name, time, and works of the Pharaoh of the oppression, and the exodus of the Israelites, now take a definit place in Egyptian history, and the localities named in scripture are determined by evidence of surprising clearness." Not so, by any means!

Brugsch-Bey's book does not justify a line of this statement. The witness does not meet the promises made by the attorney in opening to the jury. Brugsch quotes not one line from any monument, papyrus, or other source that in the remotest way relates to Joseph, Moses, or the Jews by any name.

He quotes simply from Josephus what Josephus had quoted from Maneto, an Egyptian priest and savan, who wrote late enough to know all about the Moses story, an account of the Hyksos or shepherd kings in these words of Josephus, viz., he says: "There was a king called Timaios. In his reign, I know not for what reason, God was unpropitious, and people of low origin from the country of the east suddenly attacked the land, of which they easily and without a struggle gained possession. They overthrew those who ruled there, burned down the cities, and laid waste the temples of the gods. They ill-treated all the inhabitants, for they killed some and carried into captivity others, with their wives and children. And they made one from the midst of them king, whose name was Salatis (Saltis or Silitis). He fixed his seat in Memphis, collected the taxes from the upper and lower country, and placed garrisons in the most important places. But he particularly fortified the eastern boundary, for he foresaw that the Assyrians, then the most powerful people, would undertake to make an attack on his kingdom. When he had found a town very conveniently situated, in the Sethroite nome to the east of the Bubastic branch of the Nile—on the grounds of an old mythical legend it was called Anaris; he extended it, fortified it with very strong walls, and placed in it as a garrison 240,000 heavily-armed troops. There he betook himself in summer, partly to watch over the distribution of provisions and the counting out their pay to his army, and partly, also, to strike fear into foreigners by making his army perform military maneuvers.

	Years.	Months.
He died after he had reigned	19	..
His successor, by name Buon (Banon or Beon), reigned	44	..
After him another, Apachnan (or Apachnas), reigned	36	7
After him Aphobis (or Aphophis, Aposis, Aphosis), reigned	61	..
And Annas (or Tamas, Tannus, Anan), reigned	50	1
Last of all Asseth (or Aseth, Ases, Assis), reigned	49	2

"These six were the first kings. They carried on war uninterruptedly with a view to destroy the land of Egypt to the roots. The whole people bore the name of Hyksos—that is, 'shepherd kings.' For Hyk means in the holy language a king; sos in the dialect of the people a shepherd or shepherds. These syllables, when put together, make the word Hyksos. Some think they were Arabs."

This is all there is of the account. Does it bear the faintest likeness to the Bible story of the captivity of the Jews? These Hyksos came with the strong hand, as a conquering nation. Instead of being slaves they were kings. The Jews, as their legend indicates, came as beggars and stayed as slaves; or as visitors not wanted—poor relations. The Hyksos were constantly parading their armies to the terror of their enemies. The Hebrews ran a fortune-telling business on dreams and prophecies—the intellectual ancestors of the gypsies. Bunsen devotes several hundred pages to prove that the Jews had their happy time in Egypt, but utterly rejects the theory that the Hyksos were they. Alas! the period of the Hyksos is just the time when the Jews, of all others, could not hav entered or left Egypt in the mode which the Bible describes, for their path across the Isthmus of Suez would hav been blocked by a more fordimable foe than the Egyptians. The Hyksos expelled the Pharaoh from his throne, burned his cities, and destroyed his gods. If Joseph or Moses or their brick-making brethren performed any such vast military achievement, why did they forget it? Usually the transactions of a people are great when told by themselvs, little when the story is told by their adversaries. But here, if we are to believe Brugsch-Bey, are a people who in their own esteem had all they could do to get straw with which to make bricks, but in the estimation of their enemies they are drilling 240,000 armed men every day, and were the terror of the world!

Not the least difficuly with Brugsch-Bey's story is that Bunsen declares that it has no reference whatever to the exodus, and Bunsen is as good a Mosite as Brugsch.

So he must manufacture Moses out of another Egyptian story. Here it is. Now watch and see if it looks like Moses. He says that "Manetho recounted, as we hav seen above, that the reign of the weak, superstitious, and unwarlike son of Ramesses produced a politico-religious outbreak among the people, who were inhumanly oppressed and persecuted, the consequence of which was an overwhelming inroad of the Palestinian hordes. In order to clear the country of the unclean persons, it is stated that he collected together all the lepers and incapable persons (i. e., those who were disabled by leprosy) in the quarries on the edge of the Arabian desert, in lower Egypt. There he imposed upon them severe tasks and privations, and cut them off from all communication from the rest of the nation (i. e., the leprous Egyptians). Influenced by conscience or some conscientious adviser, he resolved, however, after a time to mitigate in some degree their hard lot. With this view he assigned them as a residence the city of Avaris, which had been deserted since the evacuation of the shepherds, in the time of Tuthmosis III., the old city of the enemies of God, on the frontiers of Palestine. The outcasts, among whom were some priests, now made preparations for an outbreak. A priest, Ozaroph (approved by Osiris), of Heliopolis, founded a religious brotherhood or hetaery, based upon the abolition of animal worship, and consequently in direct hostility to the existing system of the popular and state religion of Egypt. Aware of the persecution which awaited them, they boldly undertook to restore the fortifications of the vast city. But not feeling sufficiently secure even with that, they called in to their assistance the same shepherds which Tuthmosis had expelled, and seized the opportunity of invading the kingdom of Egypt. These Palestinians were a numerous horde, and they overran the land of Egypt from that critical point. Menepthah collected a large army and went out against them; but when the attack was about to take place his courage failed him. He thought, as stated in the Egyptian accounts transmitted by Manetho, that he was entering into contest with the deities and would hav them opposed to him, and so retreated upon Memphis in order to secure the sacred animals and images of his gods. Having done this, he abandoned the city and the kingdom and fled with his wife and heir, five years of age (afterward Sethro II.), the sacred animals, priests, and images of the gods to the king of Ethiopia, who was his friend. . . . The king of Ethiopia placed his kingdom at the disposal of his guest and friend and stationed an Ethiopian army on the frontier, which, in conjunction with the Egyptian army, was intended to protect his own country. The Palestinians, however, desolated Egypt and exercised every kind of cruelty which religious hatred and love of plunder could suggest. This state of things lasted thirteen years, at the expiration of which Manepthah returned, and his son (afterward Sethro II.) drove the enemy out of the country." Josephus ridicules the notion that this Osarsiph could hav been Moses, and well he might. For this is an insurrection of Egyptians, not of Hebrews—for religious reasons, not overwork. Its aids are Palestinian hordes, invading Egypt with banners flying; not eruptions of lice and lizards and flies and small-pox, such at the Lord is said to hav sent to the help of Moses. It gets possession of the Egyptian throne. Was Moses ever seated on the throne of the Pharaohs? Osarsiph reigned as long over Egypt as Cromwell over England. Could an English historian describe Cromwell and the Puritans as in bondage while he reigned over England? Osarsiph was an Egyptian, not a Jew. He was a priest of Osiris, the very religion which the Jews held in horror. Was Moses ever a priest of the sun?

Yet of this story Bunsen, strongly biased by his desire to prevent any Christian idols, such as the verity and inspiration of the Old Testament, whose mythology had not been as fully sifted in his day as in ours—Bunsen, the head and front of the hieroglyphic-reading, dynasty-constructing schools of Egyptologists, says: "It is undeniable either that it is the Egyptian view of the exodus, or else that the Egyptian records said nothing at all about it. It requires no further proof that the narrativ of the evacuation of the shepherds had nothing whatever to do with the exodus of the Israelites."

To complete this comedy of errors Ewald thinks the Hebrews under Joseph and his descendants helped protect Egypt from further invasions of the Hyksos. In short, the Hyksos, who were the Jews of the captivity, according to Dr. Brugsch-Bey, were not so according to Bunsen. Osarsiph's Egyptian rebellion, which Bunsen says was the exodus, was not so according to Brugsch. Ewald's Jews were engaged in keeping Brugsch's Jews out of Egypt, and Brugsch's Jews went out of Egypt after reigning over Egypt several hundred years. Bunsen's Jews went out after reigning thirteen years, and neither Brugsch's or Bunsen's Jews were ever in captivity at all, but while they were in Egypt the Egyptians were in captivity to these foreigners.

Besides these there was one Moyses, or some name that favoring Bible defenders can twist into that form—and Egyptian names seem to be very elastic—a renegade priest of Hieropolis, an Egyptian who, with two hundred and fifty thousand leprous Egyptian followers, was driven out of the country. I might hav taken this character to be Moses, though he and his followers were all Egyptians, had not Bunsen, Ewald, Manetho, Josephus, and Brugsch all looked elsewhere for their Moses.

Every reader must see that neither account resembles the exodus any more than the conquest of Mexico by Cortes resembles the enslavement of the negro in the United States. If the Hebrews had ever reigned over Egypt they never would hav forgotten it. If they had ever been in Egypt at all the Egyptians would never hav forgotten it. According to Prof. Piazzi Smyth also (The Great Pyramid, p. 328), "There are not in the hieroglyphics any allusions to the Israelites through all the times from Joseph to Moses," and this he asserts to be "the united voice of the most learned Egyptologists."

Sir Isaac Newton became, after the period of mental ill health which followed the writing of his "Principia," almost as intensely wrapped up in religious studies as Swedenborg, after a like period of mental unsoundness. Despite his great scientific and mathematical penetration, he was nearly as credulous as John Taylor upon theological dogmas. In his treatis on the "Sacred Cubit of the Hebrews" he undertook to connect the Egyptians with the Hebrews, but ended by showing that in the earliest historical period in Egypt a cubit of 20 7-10 British inches was in vogue, and that this is the cubit which appears in the building of the pyramid, while the Hebrew cubit was a totally different one of 25 British inches. Newton supposed the entrance into the pyramid and each of its ordinary passages to be two of these profane or Memphian cubits high and two cubits wide. I am unable to reconcile such a statement with Howard Vyse's and other recent measurements, which make the breadth of the entrance passage, of the first ascending passage, of the passage to the queen's chamber, and of the antechamber from 41.3 to 41.5 inches, and the hight at right angles to the line of inclination a greater figure, variously stated at from 43.7 to 47 inches, and differing slightly as to the different passages, in one reaching to 68 inches, but uniformly showing that the hight of all these passages differs from the breadth. This negativs Sir Isaac Newton's hypothesis, as neither the hight nor the breadth doubles the so-called "pyramidal" cubit or "sacred cubit of the Hebrews," viz., 25 inches, though the breadth is very nearly a double of the profane cubit of Memphis, of about 20.7 inches. As the latter cubit is not founded on the earth's radius, it follows that the extended speculations which hav been indulged in rest on a very narrow foundation of fact, for the cubit of 25 inches which the metrological romancers hav endeavored to connect with the pyramid does not measure evenly into either of its five principal passages, whether in breadth or transverse or perpendicular hight. Indeed, it may be doubted if the hight and breadth of these several passages exhibit any other intent than that of exceeding the mysterious coffer which occupies the central chamber of the pyramid, as they are all $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wider and $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches higher than that coffer. And yet it does not appear that this increase of width and hight would avail to enable the coffer to be got into or out of the pyramid after the completion of the latter without some means of enlarging the passageway at the point where the coffer, 7.6 feet long, would hav to turn from the descending to the ascending passage. Newton, according to Smythe, derived his measurements from Greaves (Our Inheritance, etc., p. 127); and apart from their inaccuracy as measurements, they all set forth the cubit of Memphis, 20 inches, which has no metrological significance. Smythe quotes Newton as having proved it to hav been constructed in terms of the cubit of Memphis, or very nearly the common cubit of Egypt at the present day (20 inches), in the following argument, which is Newton's: "That the pyramid was built by the cubit of this magnitude appears from several dimensions of it. The square passage leading into it of polished marble was in breadth and hight 3.673 of the English foot; that is, two of the above-mentioned cubits of Memphis; and of the same breadth and hight were the four other galleries. In the middle of the pyramid was a chamber most exquisitly formed of polished marble (according to Greaves, Newton's informant, but Smythe says it is granit), containing the monument of the king. The length of this chamber was 34.38 English feet, and the breadth 17.19; that is, it was 20 cubits long and 10 cubits broad, the cubit being 1.719 of the English foot. . . . The marble gallery which led into this chamber was 6.87 feet; that is, four cubits of the chamber in breadth. In the middle of this gallery was a way of polished marble 3.435 feet; that is, two cubits broad; and on both sides of the way were two banks, like benches, of polished marble (granit), likewise 1.717 feet broad and 1.717 feet deep; that is, in breadth and depth one cubit. Who will, therefore, imagin that so many dimensions, not at all depending upon each other, should correspond by mere chance with the length of the cubit assigned by us?"

From Sir Isaac Newton's enthusiastic statement,

all the five passageways must be deducted, his measurement being incorrect. The king's chamber is 205 inches wide and 411 inches long. Instead of an even 10 cubits of Memphis wide, it is 9.42 cubits wide. Instead of an even 20 cubits long, it is 19.35 cubits long. It is needless to follow such a theory farther. The coincidence on which it is predicated has no existence. This disposes of the Memphian cubit as having no relation to the dimensions with which it has been sought to connect it.

It is alleged, however, that the 25-inch cubit, called by some the pyramidal cubit, and by Sir Isaac Newton the sacred cubit of the Hebrews, is exhibited in the base line of the pyramid by being contained as many times in each line of the base as there are days in the year. Even this is not quite exact, for there are 9.168 English inches in each base line of the pyramid, which, being divided by 25, the number in the pyramidal cubit results in 366.70 instead of 365.24, the quotient required.

While the evidence that a cubit of any kind is indicated in the pyramid measurements depends thus partly on false measures and partly on enthusiasm for its basis, a singularly untenable attitude has been assumed by the astronomical school in asserting both that the sides of the pyramid were designed to express in sacred cubits the number of days in the year, and that the diagonals between the four corners were also designed to state in inches the number of years in the great year of the Pleiades. As it is a conceded fact that the number of days in our year bears no necessary ratio or proportion to the number of years in the great year of the Pleiades, or 25,867 years, while the number of inches in the two diagonals of the pyramid are wholly dependent upon and determined by the number of cubits in its sides, it follows that, if the number of cubits in its sides sets forth the number of days in our year, that forms no reason whatever why the number of inches in the two added diagonals should equal the number of years in the great year of the Pleiades. But the actual length of the sides of the pyramids is assumed to hav been fixed with a design to express in cubits the number of days in the year. If this were so, and if any square which would on its base line state in cubits the number of days in our terrestrial year would also, by the number of inches in its two diagonals, state the number of years in the great year of the Pleiades, then no intent to express the latter fact would need to be attributed to the pyramid builders. It would only be necessary for them to hav aimed to express in cubits, in the sides of the pyramids, the number of days in the year, and the rest would hav followed. A coincidence, however, which appears only once, viz., in the base line of the pyramid, and which is certainly not a marked feature of other portions of the structure, is too slight a fact on which to base any theory that the builders of the pyramid knew of any 25-inch cubit. It is a pity to spoil so good a story as that the pyramids exhibit evidence of a cubit exactly the one ten-millionth parth of the earth's radius from the equator to the poles, but we see no alternativ. On this fair basis of supposition our imaginativ friends, John Taylor and Piazzi Smyth, hav reared a really brilliant hypothesis that, before history began or even mythology dawned, some people residing in Egypt knew the distance of the earth's semi-radius from the equator to the pole, and had even made it the basis of a table of measurements.

This imaginary cubit which Newton looked for but could not find, and which Smyth hoped he had found, was the unit of an inspired metrology: One hundred of them made an acreside, twenty-five of these acresides made a mile, four of these miles made a league, and one thousand of these leagues made a semi-diameter of the earth, thus furnishing a complete system of metrology from which our English system has varied only just far enough to reveal that it is imperfect.

Thus the 1-250,000,000th of the earth's semi-axis of rotation, which is the pyramidal inch, is only 1-1,000th of an inch more than the English inch.

The 1-10,000,000th of the same semi-axis, or the cubit of the pyramid, is 2.083 feet, or about two feet and one inch.

The 1-100,000th of the earth's semi-axis, or the acreside of the pyramidal scale, would be 9.992-10,000th of an English acreside; i. e., it would lack just 8 parts in 10,000, or 1 part in 1,250 of being an even English acreside.

The 1-4,000th of the earth's semi-axis is 9,874-10,000th mile; i. e., the English mile lacks 126-10,000ths, or about 4-500ths, of being the even fraction, which would be arrived at by constructing the mile on the basis of 2,500 pyramidal cubits, and, finally:

The 1-1,000ths of the earth's semi-axis of rotation is 1.3,166th leagues, sufficient to suggest that it might hav originated our league, but that whether it did or not, it is the more perfect of the two. The pyramidal table is more perfect than any decimal, metrical system yet devised, even by the French, who base theirs on the 1-10,000,000th part of the length of the curved line running from the equator through Paris to the pole. It is obvious, however, that the 1-10,000,000th of a straight line running from the equator along the line of the earth's axis to the pole reveals a closer mathematical accuracy than the French savants developed.

Here, then, is the so-called pyramidal table, founded on the so-called pyramidal cubit, whose presence in the pyramids is hypothecated on false measures elaborated by ciphering poets.

One inch equals roughly 1 thumb-breadth, or 1-250,000,000th of the earth's semi-axis.

One cubit equals 25 inches, or 1-10,000,000th of the earth's semi-axis.

One acreside equals 100 cubits, or 1-100,000th of the earth's semi-axis.

One mile equals 25 acresides, or 1-4,000th of the earth's semi-axis.

One league equals four miles, or 1-1,000th of the earth's semi-axis.

One semi-axis equals 1,000 leagues.

Sir Isaac Newton tried hard to see in the pyramid the sacred cubit of the Hebrews. Very good Hebraists of the present day deny that any data exist for determining the true length of the cubit of the Hebrews. On this point, therefore, I hav no opinion. I simply say:

4. That the theory that the unit of measurement of the pyramid is a cubit of nearly 25 British inches, and of exactly 1-10,000,000th part of the earth's semi-axis of rotation, must be abandoned as having no sufficient basis of fact to rest upon. As this relieves the ancient Egyptians of much of the supernal knowledge necessary to hav accommodated them to the astronomical theory, still more does it relieve us from defining whether they got their knowledge by inspiration or in the natural way.

5. The sole entrance to the great pyramid is by a tube or passageway of masonry, the dimensions of which, perpendicularly to the incline, are 47 inches high by 41½ wide, and which enters at a point about one-eighth of the way up from the base to the summit of the pyramid, and descends at an angle of 26 degrees 18 minutes from the horizontals. Between this angle of descent into the pyramid and the angle of ascent of a tube about 6 by 8 inches, which ascends from the principal interior chamber of the pyramid to the outer surface, known as the ventilating tube, there seems to be this relation, viz., that while neither of these tubes points exactly to the north pole, the exact medium between the two would, and hence that if at any time there had been a so-called pole star, revolving around the pole, at a distance therefrom of 3 degrees 42 minutes, the descending entrance would point exactly toward this star in its lower culmination, or when it was nearest the horizon, while the so-called ventilating tube leading from the king's chamber would point toward the same star in its upper culmination, or when it was farthest from the horizon. No burden seems to hav rested on the builders of the pyramid to make plain to posterity the motiv of their singular contrivances. But here are two passages pointing outward, both due north, to two points in the heavens, both exactly 3 degrees 42 minutes from the pole, the one above and the other below the pole. If either of them had pointed toward the pole, the angle of inclination would hav been 30 degrees, which would hav corresponded exactly to the latitude of the pyramid, and would merely hav indicated that the builders of the pyramid could locate the pole, which would not be a very difficult achievement. Both Newton and Herschell hav inferred from these two angles that at the date of its erection there was a pole star at this distance from the pole. This has occurred at two periods, one about 2,170 years before Christ, and the other at about 3,500 years before Christ. From this Newton inferred that 2,170 years before Christ was the most probable date of its erection. By the apparent star movement known as the precession of the equinoxes, but which is really due to a gyratory motion made by the earth on its axis, the star α Draconis, which is now 24 degrees away from the pole, was then, as Herschell calculates, revolving around it at 3 degrees 42 minutes, near enough to be the pole star of that epoch.

Both the entrance and the air orifices opening into the pyramids were probably closed up at the opening of the historic period, and so continued until the Caliph Al Mamoun discovered the entrance by quarrying directly into the side of the pyramid in A.D. 820. At least the only evidences to the contrary are that Herodotus described only a descending passage, terminating in a well through which flowed the waters of the Nile. As this description never was true, it is doubtful whether it was founded on a knowledge of the actual passage, or whether on mere rumor. It is also alleged that in 1820, when M. Caviglia rediscovered the subterranean chamber there were Roman letters upon its roof. On this alleged fact it is claimed that some Romans must hav entered the descending passage and the subterranean chamber prior to 820. But neither of these evidences seems adequate to establish what it is cited for. Roman letters found in 1820 can hardly prove that they were made before 820. The facts seem to be, therefore, that the great pyramid was sealed to all the world from the reign of Cheops or Suphis, whose name appears inside the pyramid in hieroglyphics which may hav been about 2100 B. C. down to A. D. 820. The encyclopedists following Bunsen hav inferred from the sealing up of these passages that the angle of their inclination has no astronomical significance. Newton and Herschell and Piazzi Smyth are equally familiar with the closing of the passages, but do not regard it as lessening the astronomical significance, since there could be no utilitarian reason for so marked a nicety in adjusting the two angles of exterior opening so as to hav them point due north, but the entrance 3 degrees and 42 mintes below the pole, and the orifice 3 degrees and 42 minutes above it. Our fifth proposition is, therefore, that the angle of inclination of the two exterior orifices of the pyramid, the one apparently intended for entrance, and the other either for astronomical observation or for ventilation, or both, were astronomically adjusted so that one should point 3 degrees and 42 minutes above the pole, and the other at a like angle below the pole, for some reason deemed important to the builders of the pyramid, but which is lost from us. We may well doubt whether this furnishes any clue to the date of the building of the pyramid, but it does indicate that the motivs were at least in part astronomical and scientific. They may hav had reference to the accurate astronomical measurement of time, though a point in the equator would hav been worth infinitly more for this purpose than one so near the pole. It must be acknowledged, however, that the passages beginning in the interior and ending in the interior are also constructed at essentially the same angle as the descending passage, and no astronomical motiv can be alleged for the angle of inclination of an interior passage. For the subterranean chamber, the queen's chamber, and the ascending gallery thirty-six feet high, none but the boldest dreamers can assign any motiv whatever. It is natural that Freemasonry should hav seized upon them and tried to connect the interior construction of the pyramid with its rites. But all evidences of the existence of Masonry prior to the ninth century are imaginary. The evidence that the coffer in the interior of the king's chamber was intended to hold the remains of a dead king is not conclusiv. The coffers in the other pyramids hav grooved sides for a lid, and the lid shoved in in such a way that when it got in a bolt fell out of the lid part way into the coffer, and remained part way in the lid so as to make it automatically self-sealing. It could not be opened without breaking the lid. The top of the coffer in this pyramid has no such arrangement. It has a groove, but its sides are perpendicular, so that if it ever had a lid the lid could not be fastened down.

Three stories are told by Arabs of the condition in which the coffer was found by Caliph Al Mamoun's men, when they by quarrying from the side of the pyramid toward its center, in 820, struck upon the central passages and groped their way, torch in hand, downward into the subterranean chamber, and then back and upward into the king's chamber. One story was that they found the coffer full of gold, the other that they found it containing a mummy, and the third that they found it empty. The latter is accepted as the fact. Indeed, it is narrated that in order to appease the riotous disappointment of his soldiers at having found no plunder in the pyramid, the caliph buried a sufficient sum to compensate them at regular rates per day for their arduous job in quarrying out the great cavity in the side of the pyramid still known as Al Mamoun's hole. He then had a dream which informed him of the hidden gold, which he announced to his soldiers. When they had dug out of the sand the exact sum which would cover their bare daily wages, they were struck with a deep sense of the profound meanness of a God who could accomplish no more for them by a miracle than exactly what they could earn at daily labor in Cairo. They did not consider a deity altogether practical who would allow a pyramid to be built and sealed up for any other purpose than to contain gold, and this opinion fell still lower when the God could descend so far below his station as to perform a miracle in order to pay a debt.

Reasons requiring close statement hav been adduced to show that the coffer was inserted in the pyramid as a standard of measurement; its interior capacity corresponding very exactly to four English quarters, or the caldron; also reasons for regarding the builders of the pyramid as having been more familiar with the exact distance of the earth from the sun and even with the weight of the earth than astronomers hav been until very recently. But I must halt. I hope merely to state the condition of the great Egyptian riddle, considered in its conflicting aspects as a source of modern discussion, and to establish that it is a riddle of a profound intellectual dignity, perhaps the most profound in history—but wholly unsolved. The coffer which occupies so conspicuous a position in the pyramid could not hav got inside of it after it was completed, and cannot now be taken out without breaking, for though the passages downward and upward are five inches higher and one and one-half inches wider than the coffer, yet its length of more than seven feet would leave it no room to turn in at the bend from the downward to the upward passage. It must hav been placed in the pyramid before the room in which it is deposited was built over it. It constitutes, doubtless, a very leading idea in the erection of the entire structure. More than this we cannot now know. The material of which it is composed cannot be found nearer than the Sinaic quarries of Arabia, wherein, it is said, the same name of Suphis, or Shufu, or Chemmis, or Cheops, who is supposed to be the builder of this pyramid, is found as quarry marks upon the stones—left there, it is assumed, nearly four thousand years ago. But the evidence of this is slight, and the story is "fishy." Certain singular harmonies of numbers, and especially of the numbers five and seven and fifty, pervade the structure. But of themselvs alone they inspire no particular regard, and can be made the basis of no hypothesis. But these details do not alter the general effect, nor change the answer to the question, What does all this prove? It proves that at some very early period, while Jerusalem, Athens, and Rome were still the lairs of wolves, and Babylon and Nineveh were jungles, when probably the black race had not retired from the south of Asia, or the Fins and Esquimaux from central Europe, there arose in Egypt a red race of wonderful persistency, despotic determination, and iron-handed will, who were determined to enshrine themselvs and their ideas in imperishable stone. They were slave-holders and despots, for no free people would ever hav built the monuments of Egypt in any form. Here in this despotism civilization was cradled, and science began. The plow shown on the sculptures of the Egyptians was just at the point where it differentiates from the hoe. It consisted of two wooden sticks tied together by a cord, which in one position were handled by the slave as a hoe, and in another were drawn by oxen as a plow. Here in Egypt pottery began. Seventy feet below the level of the Nile we find the relics of a people who had not yet obtained metallic implements, but at the rate of deposit by the Nile they might hav dwelt there twenty thousand years ago. On questions of time and chronology everybody is guessing, and no two guess alike. As to motivs, too, some hav guessed that the reason the pyramids were built was because their builders feared that if the body were suffered to decay the soul would not be immortal. But people who could build the great pyramid and inscribe on it no recognition of deity, no prayer, no altar of worship, no sign of a priesthood, no superstition or sacrifice whatever, and nothing but geometric facts and metrological standards, were not thinking of rescuing their souls from any religious terrors, either of punishment or of annihilation. Every fact about the pyramids negativs all religious meaning. Was the pyramid built by the Egyptians at all, or by some previous race? Where else in history does the first experiment in any art stand forth as its most perfect achievement, and all that follow exhibit only servil imitation or decline? Yet the great pyramid, so solitary in its wonders, is not only the largest, but, to an almost equal certainty, is the very oldest structure ever built by man. What were the ideas that caused it to be built? We don't know. No theory that has been presented concerning them is more than barely plausible. The pyramid, therefore, is a good stamping-ground on which, in this age of universal pretense, to learn how to say, "We don't know, and we can't find out." But the intelligence required to build it is such that we can easily assure ourselvs that those who did build it well knew that wondrous "why." The ignorance in this case belongs wholly to the last fifty centuries.

One service at least the pyramid has rendered. It has stood as a monument of man's incomprehensibility to himself. As we cannot comprehend its builders nor they us, so from the beginning the greatest mystery to mankind is man! The Jew has failed to comprehend the Gentile; the Roman has misapprehended the Greek; the occident has misunderstood the east; aristocracies hav maligned the people; mobs hav never known their kings nor kings the people; the wealthy hav frowned upon the unfortunate; the successful, calling themselvs the virtuous, hav strangled the unsuccessful in the interests of respectability; the law has executed the poor, and the judge has insulted the criminal. Is it not well, therefore, that the oldest, grandest, most intellectual effort of the human hand and brain should remain as it has always been, and now and henceforth must always be, a monument, simply and sublimely, of man's incomprehensibility to himself?

The Freethinkers' Convention.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: One thing is sure; the Hornellsville convention is to be a very large convention and a success, but it should be more than a mere success. It should be a convention that by its size and character and able utterances will command the attention of the whole country. Allow me to urge the friends of "universal mental liberty" to exert themselvs to make it such a convention. H. L. Green, Sec.

"John's Way" is a bruiser, and I hope "The Darwins" and "Studying the Bible" are equal to it. I am well satisfied with "John's Way."

Historical Jesus.

The opinion of Renan that the passage in Josephus concerning Christ is, even in part, genuin is worthy of a writer of historical romance who pictures Jesus as a Freelover and treats his readers to much flapdoodle.

All that Justin says about the "Acts of Pilate" is, "And that he (Christ) did those things" (i. e., miracles in fulfilment of prophecy) "you may learn from the acts of Pontius Pilate (I. Apol., ch. 48)." Tertullian, the next witness, says, "All these things Pilate did to Christ; and now, in fact, a Christian in his own convictions, he sent word of him to the reigning Cæsar who was at the time in Tiberius" (Apol., section 20). Lastly, Eusebius (A.D. 315): "That nothing might escape him, Pontius Pilate transmits to Tiberius an account of the circumstances concerning the resurrection of our Lord from the dead" (Book II., ch. 2).

All this accords with what has come down to us as the "Acts of Pilate," etc., which Tischendorf assigns to the second century, and the author of the article "Pilate" in Smith's Bible Dictionary to the third century. Precisely what Eusebius meant by the forgery and circulation, in the reign of Maximin (A.D. 308 and 313), of "certain acts of Pilate respecting our savior, full of every kind of blasphemy against Christ" (Book IX., chapter v), I cannot understand. The earlier documents, "Acts of Pilate," etc., are all now generally conceded to be forgeries, and there is no evidence that Justin or Tertullian referred to any other historical record.

Justin (A. D. 150) is the earliest Christian father who speaks of a Christ born of a virgin and crucified under Pontius Pilate. Justin had a disciple, Tatian, who, after the death of his master, renounced the doctrin of the incarnation and humanity of Christ, and established himself about A.D. 170 at Antioch as a Gnostic. Being afterward adjudged a heretic, most of his writings were destroyed. But he had a gospel, says Theodoret (A.D. 430), which omitted the genealogies and all other passages showing that Christ was born of David according to the flesh. Such, also, was Marcion's gospel, A. D. 140.

All we know of Celsus is what Origen (A. D. 230) has transmitted to us. But in Origen's quotations from Celsus Jesus is quite a different person from what the gospels describe, and the character agrees more nearly with that portrayed in the Talmud and the Toldoth Jeshu.

There is a chronological difficulty about Cyrenius. Publius Sulpicius Quirinus became governor of Syria about A. D. 6, and made a capitation tax in Syria and Judea about A. D. 9. Smith's Bible Dictionary tries to get over the difficulty in Luke ii, 2, by supposing that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, or that the text in Luke has been corrupted. But a like reference is made by the same gospel writer in Acts, and as there was a capitation tax about the time of the rebellion of Judas, of Galilee, referred to in Acts v, 37—i. e., about A. D. 9—it is evident enough that Luke himself made the chronological blunder, which is only one of a great many in Acts.

How could Annas and Caiaphas be high priests at the same time? It is true that Valerius Gratus deposed Ananus and appointed in succession Ishmael, Eleazer, Simon, and Caiaphas. And it is true that Ananus lived many years after his deposition, and had five sons, who succeeded to the high priesthood. But, admitting the possibility that his successors, especially his sons and his son-in-law Caiaphas, deferred to parental authority, who will believe that Pilate, in a formal death sentence of Jesus Christ, engraved on brass and in Hebrew, recognized "the pontificate of Annas and Caiaphas?" Why, the Hebrew or Aramaic name was not Annas, but Anan, and the Roman equivalent would be Ananus, just as the name Joseph is changed to Josephus. Look you, Mr. Bray, to the original brass plate and inform yourself of its internal evidence of authenticity. It is probably no more genuin than the holy coat of Treves or the golden plates on which the senseless Book of Mormon is alleged and certified to have been engraved.

The authorities cited to prove that Judea was one of the provinces of Lower Galilee and that Pilate governed Samaria and Idumea are at variance with Smith's Bible Dictionary. (Articles "Herod" and "Pilate.")

The crucifixion, says Mr. Bray, is fixed by Dr. Strong March 18th. And he should have added from McClintock & Strong's Cyclopedia that the year was probably 29. But the fatal objection to March 18, A.D. 29, or any other year, is that the Jewish Passover never occurs before March 26th. (Cham. Enc.)

But, says Mr. Bray, the word "Friday" never occurs in the New Testament. True, nor the word "Saturday." But will any one deny that the synoptics describe the crucifixion as occurring on the great Passover Day, and that the day following was Saturday or the Sabbath?

The two Gemaras (Babylonian and Jerusalem) says Mr. Bray, allude to Christ and the apostles. Not so. I commend to him the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lost and Hostile Gospels," which translates all the passages from the two Gemaras supposed to refer to Jesus, and then frankly confesses that they do not refer to the Jesus Christ of the gospels, but to another prior Jesus, who was stoned and hanged for sorcery, being the son of Mary and Joseph Pandera.

In regard to the King Aretas referred to by Paul in 2 Corinthians, xi, 32, Smith's Bible Dictionary says (I quote from the abridged edition), "There is a somewhat difficult chronological question respecting the subordination of Damascus to this Aretas;" and the writer then goes on to argue the possibility of Aretas, the father-in-law of Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, having been permitted by the Emperor Caligula, A.D. 38, to exercise power in Damascus (!); or that "the governor under Aretas" of Arabia Petra was only visiting Damascus (!). But this chronological difficulty is now solved by the discovery that Paul was a disciple of another Jesus than the one described in the gospels—a Jesus who was stoned and hanged on a tree prior to 63 B.C.—a Jesus who had several disciples with names answering to those in the gospels. (See "Lost and Hostile Gospels.") No wonder, therefore, that Paul never mentions a Roman emperor or an event occurring under any emperor. No wonder commentators find such difficulty in identifying Paul's Christ with the Jesus of the gospels.

What, though Paul says he was shipwrecked three times and was a night and a day in the deep (2 Cor. xi, 25), will it be pretended that writing thus A.D. 57 (the date assigned to the epistle), he described a shipwreck on the Island of Melita, A.D. 60 or 62 (Acts xxviii, 1)?

The Jesus of the Gospels is a myth; but there was a Jesus who was executed by the Jews for sorcery about a hundred years before. Student.

Jesus a Myth.

To the Editor of The Republican: As a Christian I hav been surprised at the articles in your paper presenting facts to prove that Jesus never lived. I was aware that his existence was denied, but I had never before seen the facts upon which this denial was based. From these facts as published it seems that no Jewish historians, nor their numerous writers at the time or soon after, when Jesus is said to hav existed in Judea, ever mentioned his name. This is astounding, especially as the four gospels are said to hav been written not in Judea but in Greece, and long after the alleged events. And I now remember that according to the New Testament the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch, and not at Jerusalem. Also, since reading these articles, and then reading the New Testament to refute them, I hav been surprised to see how greatly the story of Jesus, as there recorded, resembles the mythologies of the numerous heathen nations. I confess that these articles hav greatly shaken my faith, before that, as I thought, firmly founded on a rock. And I hav heard many other Christians say the same. I am, however, not afraid of the facts, let them lead where they will, and even the scriptures saith, "The truth will make us free." I earnestly desire not to be deceived in this important matter, and hence I hope that our Christian ministers will answer these articles on "Jesus a Myth," both in the press and in the pulpit. Dr. York in Forest Grove, Oregon.

The popular Liberal lecturer on this coast, Dr. J. L. York, of San Jose, Cal., gave three of his interesting lectures in the Liberal Hall here last Saturday and Sunday—two on Sunday. There were large and appreciativ audiences at each lecture, composed of the strength and intelligence of our population—its best citizens. The Doctor spoke on a variety of reform topics; the first evening treating the living issues of the day. He began by citing a few things in physiolcgy and pathology which the learned do not know but would like to know; he placed the cook on a high but just position; examined briefly the population question; criticised severely the great monopolies; stated that government should own the telegraph and railroad system or they would own the government; reviewed the land and money question; said that ownership in land should be abolished and only a possessory title given for the amount actually used or necessary, the same as with air and water. He favored graded taxes—taxes should be on the thousands and tens of thousands, on the surplus wealth, but not upcn the poor or industrial classes; said the state that allows a millionaire and a pauper, the robber and the robbed, is not just. No man ever earned a million dollars. The school system is not as effectiv as it should be, compared with the money expended; the scholars of the future will make thinkers, not imitators. Cheap labor is a delusion and a fraud, the cause of so much sham, shoddy, and hypocrisy; labor should be paid. The Doctor's remarks were attentivly heard and frequently applauded. They were applicable to the necessities of the times and will form the issues for future political campaigns. Sunday afternoon he spoke on natural theology, or the religion of nature, comparing the various churches and giving his preference for the latter system. In the evening he spoke on individuality, self-hood, love, courtship, and marriage, giving a true and sincere course of action as the basis upon which all these things should be conducted.

Communications.

Mr. Preston and "The Health Monthly."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a recent issue of your paper our mutual friend, Mr. Preston, kindly made mention of my difficulties with the postal department in attempting to get the Health Monthly readmitted at the rates of the second class, or, in other words, at the usual publisher's rates. In that communication he remarked that a retainer of $50 had been paid to counsel in behalf of the Health Monthly by the Defense Association, and expressed the hope that the Liberals would make up to me any losses I might sustain by having to pay the full rates of postage. In order that there may be no misunderstanding in regard to this matter, let me say:

At the outset of the trouble, when Dr. Chase, Dr. Kinget, and myself were all in the same boat, the Physiologist excluded entirely, and the Health Journal and the Health Monthly thrown into the third class, it was proposed to make a test case of Mrs. Dr. Chase's, and I pledged $25 to the Chase fund. Of the moneys contributed to the Chase fund $50 were placed in the hands of an attorney as a retainer. The intention was to commence an action against the postal authorities if the order respecting the Physiologist should not be rescinded. Before any litigation was commenced, the postal officials, doubtless perceiving that they had overstepped the mark, retreated from their position and allowed the Physiologist its rightful mail facilities. As money was needed by the Defense Association to print some documents to be used in the furtherance of the cause at Albany, the $25 I had pledged was used for this purpose. At the same time it was decided that as lawyers do not return retainers, the attorney who had been originally engaged should go right on and see what he could do on behalf of the Health Monthly and the Health Journal.

The proposition that the Liberals should make up to me losses sustained by the denial of the privileges of the second rate to the Health Monthly, although made with the kindest of motivs, is a mistake. I do not wish to hav the Liberals do this. If the post-office officials remain obstinate, and the subscribers of the Health Monthly should see fit to make up the extra postage I am obliged to pay for mailing it, I should consider it a kindness, and, if they really value the matter that is served up to them, as only just. I hav occasionally received some donations to the Health Monthly, but I hav invariably turned them over to the Defense Association as if contributed to the Defense Fund, and shall so continue to do unless it should be decided by the Association in some emergency to make some case of mine "a test case."

This explanation is justly due the Defense Association itself for the reason that its treasury is at present somewhat depleted, and that it sadly needs replenishing for carrying on the general objects of the Association. Contributors to the fund might feel some hesitation in coming forward to do this if the contributions were to be used for the purpose of making up to any one losses sustained by an unjust ruling like that from which the Health Monthly is presently suffering. The activ members of the Association hav on many occasions been required to put money into the treasury from their individual pockets, but hav never taken out a cent for any personal uses whatever. Only a week ago Mr. Bennett contributed ten and I fifteen dollars when money was needed to pay a bill of electrotyping done for the Association. E. B. Foote, Sr., M.D.

From Illinois.

Friends of the Liberal Cause in Illinois: I wish to inform you through the columns of The Truth Seeker that from the lack of means I am obliged to giv up my long-cherished plan of going to the northern part of the state to hold another Liberal camp-meeting this fall. The Liberals and Freethinkers in the northern part of the state hav neglected to respond to my many earnest appeals for help in carrying forward the work in this state, and my necessities compel me to remain in the portions of the state where I can get a little pecuniary aid to help me along in my work for the advancement of the Liberal League movement in Illinois.

I shall turn from this point and try to work my way south again in the hope of getting to St. Louis in time for the next National Liberal League Congress, in September. I shall try and do some lecturing in the central and southern portions of Illinois this fall and the coming winter. My efforts will be mainly directed toward increasing the strength of the Liberal League movement in Illinois. Those wishing my services are requested to correspond with me by addressing me at Springfield, Ill. And all who desire to become members of the Illinois State League can do so by sending me one dollar each as a life-membership fee. Any other aid the liberally-inclined are disposed to send me will be most thankfully received.

My year's buggy trip over the state is nearly up, and I think of disposing of my rig and taking to the railroad for another year's trip over the state. Now, my Liberal friends, please let me hear from you. A little from each reader of this would help me amazingly, and it would enable me to do a great deal more for our cause than I hav heretofore been able to do with my limited means. Address me, until further notice, Springfield, Ill.

Seeds Dropped by the Wayside.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Left Bellevue June 1st, taking passage on board the Diamond Jo for McGregor. Was twenty-four hours in making the eighty-three miles of our trip, the Diamond Jo having two heavily-laden barges in tow. The barge business on the Mississippi is increasing, and those interested in the problem of cheap transportation are looking eagerly toward this natural commerce way in the hope that time, skill, and government aid will make it a successful rival of railroad monopolies. But what hope of this if Jay Gould or some other monopolist owns the barges! Does not the remedy for existing ills lie rather in the government ownership, or at least control, of the railroads? Will some one wise in the lore of the Goulds and Vanderbilts please tell us how a railroad roadbed can be private property? McGregor is tucked in between two precipitous bluffs, and is called the "pocket city." Its single business street runs back into the hills, while its residence streets run out from this street until they are lost in the nativ forest.

Leaving this place on the morning of June 3d, we proceeded over the C. M. & St. P. R. R., passing up the Mississippi to North McGregor, thence through an opening in the bluffs westward until the village of Beulah was reached, where I changed on to the "Iowa Eastern" for Bismarck. This latter is a "narrow gage," and as its engin was disabled, we trusted ourselvs to the tender mercies of a "dummy," said "dummy" being a hand-car roughly fixed up to carry the mails and a few passengers, the united power being a one-horse power engin. This was its first trip over the road, and another hand-car, propelled by human muscles, went along as a reserve force, and it had no difficulty in keeping up with us, for our engineer could not keep up sufficient steam, and so we had to stop occasionally to let the weary iron steed breathe a spell.

But Bismarck was at last reached, and then a tramp of one mile into the country brought me to the pleasant home of our genial friend, Dr. John Brown. I found our friend and his wife both strongly in favor of organization, and I think that a Clayton county League is one of the probabilities of the near future.

The next morning I proceeded on my way as far as Postville. I remained here and in the vicinity for nearly a week, enjoying the hospitalities of G. L. Henderson most of the time. Other Liberals here are Alexander Henderson, W. P. Ward, and Mr. Douglass.

From Postville I went to Ossian, in Winneshiek county. Remained here some eight days, speaking three times, and succeeding in organizing the Ossian Liberal League. Mr. and Mrs. James Daniels, Nelson Schumaker, the Rosa brothers, W. Rathbun, W. Carter, P. Husted, M. Hostetter, and other outspoken Freethinkers hav comfortable homes here on the entrancingly beautiful and fertil prairies of southern Winneshiek.

But time flies, and we must away, however much we may love to linger amid these fair, sylvan scenes.

I am under especial obligations to friend Daniels and family for hospitalities freely extended. The Ossian Liberal League will never lack for good string music so long as brother Daniels and his boys remain among its members. Three violins and a bass viol in one family are enough to make his satanic majesty the patron saint of that household, if the orthodox estimate of the innate depravity of these instruments is the correct one.

In extending thanks for kindnesses received, I must not forget friend Rathbun, who, although he is a little doubtful about the necessity of organization, is an earnest humanitarian.

At Charles City things seemed to be jogging along in about the same old way. John Mahara and wife, Mrs. D. Andrews, Miss Ettie Andrews, Carl Mescal, Andrew High, Ira Dodge, and the Wheats are still faithful sentinels on the watch towers of freedom.

A Floyd county League should be organized at once and represented in the next Congress of the League.

There are enough secularists at Nora Springs, Rudd, Charles City, Rockfield, and in the adjacent country to make a good strong organization. Remember this, Organized wrong can be overcome only by organized right.

From Charles City to Stillwater, Mitchell county, riding up across the country with our own sturdy ex-laborer, Robert Bradshaw, canvassed for a number of days in the neighborhood of Stillwater, Deerfield, and Orchard, meeting my old acquaintances, Mr. and Mrs. Frost, E. J. and J. F. Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. Crawford, Mr. and Mrs. Douglass, and others; also made the acquaintance of Mr. George Brown, of Deerfield, a scholarly and earnest Freethinker.

Spoke at the "Blue schoolhouse" one sultry June night, and had a pleasant rencontre with a good Christian brother, who did not know (nothing strange) what was in his Bible.

The next stopping-place was Osage, where I met Dr. Whittemore, Mr. Edge, and one or two others, friends of the Spiritualistic wing of the Liberal army.

Saturday, July 2d, at 5:30 A. M., stepped on board a passenger train of the Illinois Central road for Lyle, Minnesota. At Lyle waited several hours for the northward bound train on the Austin and Mason City branch of the C. M. and St. P. railroad. At Austin waited again for the connecting train on the Iowa division of the same immense network of iron, and at 4:30 P. M. reached Northfield, Rice county, my first stopping-place.

Minnesota is a beautiful state, but railroad travel was very disagreeable on this particular day, the heat and dust combining to torment to the utmost the Infidel as well as Christian pilgrim. With such a land as ours, what might we not accomplish if liberty, love, and justice ruled the lives of all? Alas! that there should be so much slavery, mental, industrial, and social; so much hate, jealousy, envy, revenge, and fear; so much injustice in every department of our national, state, neighborhood, and family associations. Nine-tenths of the men and women of even this favored land liv in a little, narrow, contracted pen of deeds and aspirations, scarcely ever catching a glimpse of the wide sweeping plains and limitless ocean of human endeavor and accomplishment. Life is one ceaseless round of drudgery, alike to the household automaton and the wage slave, and no new love or hope ever comes to cheer and gladden these isolated lives, and if it did quite likely the foolish slave would spurn it as a visitation of the devil of temptation and hug the chain of custom the closer. But the light is dawning. Try to meet it, ye who would be free. Believe no longer the old antiquated lies. Stand forth free, self-respecting men and women. E. C. Walker.

Cursing and Swearing.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The prevalence in Christian countries of the habit of cursing and swearing, and the rapidity with which this habit is adopted by nations which get converted to Christianity, argues the relationship of the Christian faith with a set of emotions in the human mind which find in this habit their normal and proper expression. Whether the natural man possesses an innate propensity to curse and swear may well be doubted, seeing that nations which hav not come in contact with the Christian faith are not addicted to this practice, except in some mild forms. In consequence of the existence of these mild forms among the "heathen," however, we should be hardly justified in ascribing the emotions which demand these forms of verbal expression to those only who hav been "born again." Still it is undeniable that although this habit may not be exclusivly Christian, it has reached its present high state of development only under the fostering wing of the Christian church.

We know that the ancient Greek was wont to embellish his discourse with now and then a "By Zeus," or "By Apollon;" and the Roman with a "By Jupiter;" and that the Athenian, in the way of cursing, wished the object of his malediction "to the ravens," which place seems to hav been a swamp somewhere in the neighborhood of the city frequented by these birds. Judging from specimens of the talks of these ancient peoples that hav come down to us, their cursing and swearing was of a quite different nature to that of our modern Christians. It lacked force and earnestness. In its angriest moods, the Greek mind never conceived of sending its adversary to a place where he should be tortured eternally.

We hav good authority for believing this habit to be essentially a Christian one. We read about Peter, that rock on which the church was founded, how on a certain occasion he "immediately began to curse and swear," the conditions under which he did it, and the coupling of the two words, show that Peter's cursing and swearing was of the same species as now survives among his followers. Jesus also took a hand in the cursing business, as that fig-tree which got so effectually damned for not bearing figs in the wrong season bears witness. We may be permitted, then, to regard Jesus and Peter as the practical originators of the practice; and we need not wonder that the Christian world still curses and swears, seeing that it but faithfully treads in their footsteps.

Nevertheless, some of the Christian sects hav put the practice under their ban. We don't precisely see why they hav done so. The Christian church has always practically damned its enemies in this world, burned them at the stake, and tortured them in every way conceivable; and when their souls hav finally escaped its clutch, has always believed that God would forever continue the process. Consistently, we think, they should regard cursing as one of the foremost of Christian virtues and a necessary factor in that wonderful "plan of salvation." And that is just the reason why the practice of cursing continues to flourish. It is the genuin expression of a set of emotions generated by a religion which requires its votaries to believe that almost the entire human race ought to be and will be damned. The Christian gets so habituated to look upon his fellow-mortals as doomed to undergo this fate that his natural sympathies become so far blunted that he looks with complacency for the damnation of his nearest relativs and friends.

We think the men who get converted to Infidelity ought, consistently, to discontinue cursing and swearing. We know it is a difficult job to root out this habit, especially when inherited from a hundred or two of generations of Christian ancestors; but really it should be done. This practice is the last vestige of Christianity which sticks to us. Frequently some Infidel who seems to hav eliminated the entire Christian mode of thought betrays by an "I don't care a damn!" the fact that he was brought up in a Christian country and by implication received a Christian education.

The Christian religion has certainly enriched our vocabulary by the creation of these expressions; and we very much fear that, like small-pox and measles, the acquisition will be permanent. And, if so, how about the religion of the future? If it is going to be a necessity for us to continue this practice, and at the same time not believe a word of the system which originated and developed it, we shall eventually work out a compromise between them which, as Herbert Spencer shows in his "Data of Ethics," "must always be the result when conflicting theories are simultaneously held." Comte failed to provide against this. He developed a catechism out of the Positiv philosophy, but furnished no formulas to curse and swear by. No wonder that Positivism makes no greater headway, nor that a distinguished disciple should be in danger in his decrepitude of relapsing to the faith in which he was first taught to pray, and presumably to curse and swear. Voltaire's and Pope's systems of pure Theism likewise failed to furnish anything to satisfy their want of human nature, and what has become of it?

Our friend, Mr. Townsend, of Locust Valley, who has expounded in THE TRUTH SEEKER his theory of the "Subtil Materiality of Mind," has still a chance to furnish the required formulas. He translates God into "the infinit mind," and throws open the door for a new system of theology, creeds, dogmas, catechisms, ritual, and what not. But on reflection, "By the infinit mind" would never succeed. The emphasis and expressivness of the great original would never attach to it. That "straight man" Herbert Spencer writes about will hardly hav any use for anything of the kind; but he is still a long way ahead. Meanwhile we must hav a theory for the "less crooked man" (as compared with the present man) to liv and talk by. None of the various theories toward which the human reason is evoluting are apparently able to furnish any formula to curse by. Perhaps some makeshift for swearing might be discovered to wean the human tongue from its old ways and assist us in bridging over the broad stream that separates us from the "straight man" of the future. An Infidel Among Christians.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The "Lord" having called me to labor for several weeks in northern Indiana and southern Michigan, afforded me an excellent opportunity to attend the "Island Park Assembly" of Christians, third annual session, from June 29th to July 15th.

Even an Infidel, who has not a very high estimate of Christianity, confesses that it was a grand affair, admirably arranged, smoothly and ably managed. Every officer connected with the assembly seemed to know his duty, and performed it with precision and courtesy. The superintendent is a prince of presiding officers. He knew just what to say, and how to say it. I like to see business done well.

Where is Island Park? It is the name of an island in Sylvan Lake, near Rome City, Noble Co., Ind. The island contains about twenty acres, covered by a beautiful grove of young trees, affording a refreshing shade, doubly grateful this hot July. Art has lent her aid to nature in making the island a delightful spot, the gently undulating land laid out by wide gravel walks. There were gushing fountains and murmuring rivulets; rustic bridges; flower beds; pavilions; a large, well-built tabernacle with seating capacity of three thousand; boarding house; assembly hall; scores of double-roofed and single tents.

The lake is four miles long, on whose surface often glided more than one hundred row-boats and a pretty little steamer, besides ferry craft (not much "glide" to the latter). At night the illuminations on lake and island made the scene enchanting.

The exercises were varied and interesting, although of Christian flavor, of course. I heard one speaker carry the Christian adjectiv to an absurd point. He told about Christian charity, Christian benevolence, Christian institutions, including Christian education and Christian government; finally he put the cap-sheaf on by reference to "Christian eyes!" Even the weather was Christian; the first day there came up a Christian wind and blew over the Christian pole of the Christian tent. As far as I could judge, the only unchristian exceptions around the Christian island were this Infidel and his wife and the Chinese and Japanese lanterns. (I almost wonder they did not baptize them.)

The music was first-class. There were the Tennesseeans (colored songsters), the Constantine (Mich.) Band (one of the finest), Prof. C. C. Case, the owner of a magnificent voice, and a gentleman of great aptitude in musical instruction.

Among the distinguished preachers were President Moss, LL.D., Rev. Dr. Pierson, Rev. Hurlburt, Rev. D. W. Moffat, D.D., Prof. Cumnock, A.M., W. X. Ninde, President of Garrett Biblical Institute, Rev. J. H. Vincent, and others.

There were also several excellent lecturers, the most notable George W. Bain, Frank Beard, and Walter Q. Scott.

The hours from 7 A.M. to 10 P.M. were full of work and recreation combined. There were sermons, lectures, normal schools, music college, art school, school of microscopy, kindergarten, and museum.

The church will steal science as sure as Liberals are asleep. I see it. Christians work as if they meant every stroke to count; no half-heartedness about them. They propose to hold on to the young folks as long as they can. To this end they spend their time and money; they unite amusement, recreation, with instruction; they compass sea and land to gain proselytes; they endow colleges and enrich churches; they modify doctrins to hold positions; they fill the chairs of educational institutions, and scent skepticism from afar. Liberals, fully qualified to teach, find college doors slammed in their faces. Christians hold the keys yet of the schools of America. Liberals will need Leagues until every university down to every common school will welcome the Freethinking teacher equally with the Christian, the only question for fitness being qualification to teach, not religion to believe.

Such was one of the trains of thought that passed through my mind as wife and I sat five hours a day, for five days, among the Christians, twenty-five hours of Christian music, Christian prayer, Christian sermon, Christian mirth (for one of the reverends told the congregation that there is such a thing as "consecrated humor." After that assurance the Christian laugh was more hearty.)

The clergy hav frequently charged Infidels with bigotry, to parry the thrust made at themselvs, an unwillingness to listen to Christian preaching. It is because sermons are one-sided affairs. But, even as it is, many Freethinkers giv audience to the "heavenly" embassadors. How many Christians will listen to our side as decorously as we did to theirs for twenty-five hours? Until they do, their accusation is ill-founded. We hav listened to their gospel, the same Christ-and-him-crucified doctrin, until we know it by heart. When the Christian world listen to our teachings a hundred times over, as we hav hearkened to theirs, they may then hav the shadow of a right to complain of the bigotry of Freethinkers. Now they hav none. Hav the mass of Christians ever made it a point to giv ear to all phases of our teachings even once? No. Those who hav become acquainted with Freethought, and in consequence hav espoused it, furnish a clue to the alarm of the church. Those who learn what Liberalism is hav no further use for Christianity. Rare indeed are the exceptions to this rule. Then what? Almost universally the clergy warn their hearers, and the hearers importune each other, not to listen to Infidel teaching. Where is the Liberal that warns anybody to refuse a hearing to the other side?

In my next I will hav something to say of the sermons I heard. W. F. JAMIESON.

Government Patronage, Public Offices, and their Proper Disposition.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One of the most pernicious sources of political and official corruption, and of personal danger to heads of departments, markedly that of the President, is the present onerous system of appointments to office.

Such extended monopolizing, one-man power, grasping the whole Union, has a very deleterious effect upon the legitimate duties of the President and heads of departments in that their time is so largely occupied by the corrupting influences of personal favoritism in the hosts of appointments to office. Such system, too, corrupts the purity of our elections in every state of the Union, by which nominees are made the tools of political cliques and "wire-pullers," and, among the people, creates and maintains a large class of selfish aspirants, who become sycophantic dependants upon public office, and so continually engaged in promoting their own selfish advancement, with no patriotic desires for the public good—a wholly undemocratic system; too much one-man power for a true republic.

Our government needs purifying, and can be made vastly more incorruptible and efficient for the public weal by making the following simple and just changes in its mode of appointments to all offices, and thus more completely identifying each state as a responsible part of the confederated Union:

Let the senate of each state (when not in armed rebellion against the United States) appoint a committee of six members to nominate persons to fill all government offices located in their respectiv states, to be then confirmed or rejected by a majority of such state senate, each senate, by advice of said committee, to hav the exclusiv power of removals and to fill vacancies in such public offices, and to make each state pecuniarily responsible to the general government for any speculations or defalcations of such appointees.

With regard to cabinet officers, heads of departments, judges, and other local officers at the seat of government in the district of Columbia, and all foreign ministers and consuls, as well as army and naval officers, let them be exclusivly nominated by a committee of six members of the Senate of the United States, and then to be confirmed or rejected by a majority of such senate; such senate, by advice of such committee, to hav the exclusiv power of removals and to fill vacancies in such offices.

Making in all such nominations and appointments by the senates of states and United States civil service promotions for merit a prominent feature of this system of appointments to all offices whenever experienced, adaptable persons are attainable in such departments.

Government thus purified, we will hav no more incentivs to assassinations or corrupting, packed cabinets to serve one man, or other cliques in departments, which now excite animosity, vitiate the public service, and giv undue importance to our officials, and so corrupt the government and the morals of our people in the continued "hangers-on" upon official patronage at the seat of government.

Yours for the right, CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

Michigan Camp-Meeting.

The State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists will open their second annual camp-meeting on the beautiful camping-grounds of Gaguac Lake, one mile and a half from Main street, city of Battle Creek, Mich., from Aug. 12th to Aug. 22d. A full line of able speakers hav been engaged.

Sunday, Aug. 14th, J. H. Burnham, Saginaw City, Mich.; A. B. French, Clyde, O.; Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Discoe, Mich.; Aug. 15th, George H. Geer, Minnesota; Mrs. L. A. Pearsall; Aug. 16th, Mrs. M. C. Gale, Saginaw, Mich.; A. B. French; Aug. 17th, J. H. Burnham, George H. Geer; Aug. 18th, M. Babcock, St. Johns, Mich.; A. B. French; Aug. 19th, Dr. A. B. Spinney, Detroit, Mich.; George H. Geer, G. B. Stebbins, Chicago; Aug. 20th, Mrs. M. C. Gale, G. B. Stebbins, M. Babcock; Aug. 21st (Sunday), Dr. A. B. Spinney, J. H. Burnham, G. B. Stebbins; Aug. 22d, 10 A.M., general conference and business meeting.

Appropriate singing, accompanied by instrumental music, will be a feature of the entire meeting. The forenoon of each week day will be devoted expressly to mediums. A majority of those present shall say how the time shall be spent. Many valuable mediums hav signified their intention to be present and hold seances. The medium's tent will be in order on the grounds.

All railroads mentioned below will sell round trip tickets at two cents per mile each way, from Aug. 11th to Aug. 22d, good to return the 23d: Chicago & Grand Trunk railroad, without a certificate. N. B.—Michigan Central railroad, Grand Rapids & Indiana railroad, Detroit, Lansing, and Northern railroad, Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee railroad, require a certificate to be presented to the ticket agent in order to obtain reduced rates. Certificates can be had by inclosing an addressed and stamped envelope to the secretary, E. L. Warner, Paw Paw, Mich. For full particulars see bill. General supervisor of grounds, tent privileges, etc., R. B. Cummins, Battle Creek, Mich.

Directors, B. F. Stamm, Detroit; Hon. J. H. White, Port Huron; Mrs. G. Merrill, Lansing. Treasurer, Mrs. R. A. Shaffer, South Haven.

Overjoyed.

DEAR BENNETT: I am so glad thee is to illustrate thy forthcoming books of travel. It will be a great expense to thee, and I think we all ought to help a little, so I send twenty-five cents more, and hope every star in the galaxy will do as much according to means and desires. We want these books to be a glory to thee and the great cause thee champions.

ELMINA.

Letters from Friends.

CORSICANA, TEX., July 20, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed find postal order for $5 as promised, on trip around the world.

Hoping you will receive this in time and my best wishes, I remain,

Yours sincerely, J. P. HAILEY.

P. S.—While you are away from home I think I can add some four or five to the list for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Perhaps others will try and do the same, so when you return home you will feel it was good that you served us in making the trip. J. P. H.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., July 16, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Your notice reminding me of my obligation to you has been received, and here is your $5 in return. The books I must hav, although I am reaching beyond my ability in buying so many books of you and taking the paper also. But, sir, I cannot stop THE TRUTH SEEKER; without it I am lost, I am miserable; there is something lacking in all books and journals which it supplies. And now may you ride round this earth in safety; and as you come across this continent on the way from San Francisco to your dear wife and home, I know you will make a call at Eureka Springs, won't you? We want to see your face and we want to hear you talk? Call on us, Mr. Bennett, and I will go to work at once and try to organize a Liberal League here. You will find here the largest city on the globe for its age. Eureka Springs is just two years old and claims a population of about nineteen thousand. It is becoming a pleasure and health resort of the first importance. A safe and prosperous trip! Good-bye till you heave up from the West. J. T. KENNEDY.

[We will be much pleased to visit friend Kennedy and his friends. If not too far from our route we will try to call upon him.—ED. T. S.]

WINSLOW, MO., June 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $8—$5 for the world trip and credit me with $3 for the paper. I see you are elected to make the trip. Do you propose taking Comstock along to specify what is obscene and that which is not? Wishing you good health, a pleasant trip, and a safe return, I remain, Yours truly, C. L. BARRETT.

LAURA, OHIO, June 9, 1881.

ST. JOSEPH, MICH., June 30, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Agreeable to request, I send a post-office order for the $5 I pledged on the world trip. Please excuse the delay. I am traveling all the while, and at present am in the western part of the state of Michigan. I hope you will enjoy the trip. I wish it were possible for your wife to go. I hope that Mr. Macdonald's health will be spared, that he may conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER in such a manner as to double the subscription list on your return. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper printed on the American continent. It is the only paper that handles Comstock in the manner in which he should be, without fear or stint, and is always ready and does expose fraud and deception wherever found. Then let us rally to the standard of THE TRUTH SEEKER and sustain it liberally with our means. All honor to its brave old editor, D. M. Bennett, who, after being put in the Christian crucible, came out pure gold, and was received back into the arms of his friends with great public demonstration. Brethren, let us work while time and opportunity are given. Sow broadcast the light of truth and science until this earth shall become deluged with it. Brother Bennett, go; and may peace abide with you till you return home safe is my most sincere wish. Best regards to your faithful, patient little wife and friend Macdonald. Respectfully, JAMES S. BEDEL.

GRAND LEDGE, MICH., July 8, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I inclose you $5 to help you round the world, and also to help dispel the ignorance and superstition that exists in the world.

Yours respectfully, HARRISON HALBERT.

WAUKEE, IOWA, July 4, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Here is the the money for thy foreign mission. Hope it may be in time.

Yours most truly, A. L. GRINNELL.

DILLON, MON. TER., June 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am a little tardy, as usual, for which please excuse. Find inclosed $10, $5 of which is for the world trip, as per pledge, and $5 sent by John Murray, whose post-office address is Burnt Pine, Montana Ter., for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Paine's works complete. Now, dear Bennett, may the fates be propitious toward you. May your health and power of endurance be equal to the magnitude of the enterprise, and your efforts crowned with the most signal success, the result of which will be welcome news to all Liberals, freighted, as is your style, with gems of thought.

As ever, your sincere well-wisher and friend,

WM. KINSELLA.

BRADFORD, PA., June 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is order for $5.50—$5 to pay my subscription to help send you round the world, and 50 cents for W. J. McCune as a trial subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you a pleasant trip and a safe return, I remain, J. H. HARDISON.

CHESTER CO., PA., July 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5 for that long, long trip round the world. I should be pleased to learn that you are going to hav some suitable companion to share in the many ups and downs you will be obliged to encounter. I hav feelings of pleasure mingled with regret in your contemplated trip. First, I hope to get information that I know of no one but yourself is capable of giving. Second, taking your age and the many changes and trials which you will hav to encounter, I fear the trip will be irksome. But I hope that prudence and discretion may be your constant guides to carry you safely around and land you triumphantly back to your many friends. Truly yours, RICHARD J. LAMBORN.

TITUSVILLE, PA., June 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed money order for $6.13, which you will please apply to the following: One share in your trip round the world, and for the remaining please send some pamphlets.

Yours respectfully, JAS. SEBU and J. S. BRADLEY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., June 10, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I see your intention is to swing round the circle. As it is often for want of a mite is often more than its value, you will please allow my mite to help to guard against such a contingency. Hoping pleasure may be with you in your labors, success attend your every effort, and time deliver you safe home, are the wishes of an outsider. I am,

Very respectfully yours, H. W. WALKER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $10—$5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5 for your trip round our planet.

Respectfully yours, M. BRIEL.

BUCHANAN, MICH., July 8, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Inclosed find postal order for $5 to help pay the expenses of your trip round the world. I hope your journey may be a pleasant and safe one. When you return should you come by the way of the Michigan Central railroad, I would be pleased to hav you stop at Buchanan, and I will show you the monument that has caused so much excitement among the good Christians of the country, and I will try and entertain you for a day or two.

With best wishes for your good health and safe return, I remain Your friend and well-wisher,

JOSEPH COVENEY.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: By the tab on my TRUTH SEEKER I see that my subscription will expire July 1st, and as you are going on the proposed trip soon, I will send you $3 for the paper and $5 as my promis toward your trip round the world. Inclosed please find post-office order for $8. Yours respectfully,

GUSTAV LUCK.

HYDE PARK, VT., July 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find a postal money order to pay for the round-the-world trip.

Fraternally yours, HIRAM DWINELL.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., June 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $7—for $5 of which please send your book of travels round the world, and for the other two you will please send Dr. Chase's paper one year, which will be $1.50, and for the other fifty cents please send "Truth Seeker Tracts" of your own selection.

I hav been a reader of your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, for a number of years, and could not well do without it, but I hav kept quiet on this round-the-world business because I felt like having you stay at home and work for the good of humanity in our own country, but I am willing to abide by the will of the majority. They hav said go, and I submit. May health and happiness attend you and bring you safe back to your happy home, is the wish of your true friend, H. E. DAVIS.

MAUSTON, WIS., July 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You told me not to remit any money on the books faster than I sold them. But I cannot help it this time, as I don't consider it a sin to disobey your orders under the present circumstances. Mrs. Slenker advised every one to remit all they are owing you for books, but as I cannot do it I will do the best I can for you, as you will need all you possibly can get for your long journey. I was out this forenoon trying to get some new subscribers to the stars. I've only succeeded in getting one—that's better than none. Please add the name of John Adler to your list. He says he would like the books very much. He says you beat all writers he ever read for giving such good descriptions of all you see. He got your "Infidel Abroad," which to his mind is the best he ever saw. He is English.

Yours truly, WM. HOLGATE.

MORRILL, KAN., July 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find money order for $5.15—$5 for your journey round this priest-ridden world. None wishes you success more than I do. The 15 cents is for new version of Testament.

You must excuse my tardiness and short letter. The late spring, wet weather, cut worms, and weeds hav kept us poor cusses busy planting and replanting to keep ahead of worms and weeds. There are several things I would like to write you, but I am not in the mood for writing. When a man sees a nice stand of corn ruined in two or three days by cut worms, a fine field of wheat dying by bugs, it makes him feel pious and prayerful. J. W. SCOTT.

FRANKTON, IND., June 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: This may be the last occasion I will hav to write you before you start on your journey, so I take this opportunity to bid you farewell and wish you a pleasant trip and a safe return. I would pray for you, but I know the $2 I am owing you will do you a thousand times more good than all the prayers that could be uttered even by praying people from now until your return.

After you start on your trip I hope to see a short letter from you in the paper each week. As you return, if you can make it convenient, be sure and come by way of Anderson and giv at least one lecture. I am sure you would be paid enough to carry you many miles out of your way.

Most truly yours, L. R. WEBB.

ADRIAN, MICH., July 25, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: From your notice in your last issue I see that you are about to leave us for your round-the-world trip. As I was one of the first to indorse this movement with a little pledge to help it forward, so time and thought hav only confirmed me more and more that it is all in wisdom. And my prayer has been that there might be some one, or ones, that would feel it their duty and pleasure to accompany you, and sure enough it seems that my prayers are about to be answered. Glory hallelujah! Well, my dear and much persecuted friend and friend of freedom, I am truly glad that you are going to hav company. I hope you may be a help to each other. My parting word to you is be careful of yourselvs in person and in property. As a truth seeker, let truth be your watchword in all your statements, and may your labors be crowned with success in unveiling some of the hidden mysteries of some of the various religious superstitions of the world besides the Christian. And here I will bid you farewell.

S. D. MOORE.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 26, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Dear Sir: We herewith send you $5.00 to help you around the world, in compliance with your offer to send each subscriber a history of your travels. Hoping this will reach you before you set sail, and that you may hav a pleasant voyage,

We are respectfully yours. A. COULTER & Co.

CONWAY, June 11, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed you will find post-office order for six dollars, five for your trip around the world, and one dollar for continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I hav not received for some time. I hav been lost without that grandest of papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will please pardon my forgetfulness in not renewing immediately upon the expiration of my subscription. Here is hoping you will hav the strength and endurance to make a grand success of your trip, and giv us the facts about those humbugs which we hav been taught in our youth. WM. LINDSAY.

OSBORN, OHIO, June 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed three dollars in payment of my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 1881.

In your trip around the world I hope that you will find no worse civilization than ours, for we are yet almost savages. Look at our treatment of Chinamen in the Denver riot last fall. I trust you will meet with no such treatment at the hands of the so-called heathen of the Eastern world. How would the Christian world stand back aghast in holy horror were a Christian treated one-half as bad even among the wild Tartars of the mountain regions of the interior of Asia. I hope that you will be capable of making an unprejudiced comparison of the different systems of savagery that exist in the world. May circumstances favor you and allow you to return safely in your own good time. In haste,

FALLS CITY, NEB., May 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find ten dollars to your trip around this terrestrial globe, of which credit five dollars to Frank Wells and five to J. V. Hallebaugh, both volumes to be sent to

FRANK WELLS.

GIBSONVILLE, CAL., May 29, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find post-office order for eight dollars, five dollars of which you will please apply to your around-the-world fund, and three dollars for Dr. Joseph Simms's "Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated." With my best wishes for a pleasant and successful trip, I remain, Yours respectfully, W. W. WOOD.

ADRIAN, MICH.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav now just returned from my visit to eastern Pennsylvania and the sea-shore, where I had been with the view in part of improving my health as well as to visit with old friends and relativs. I had fully intended to make your city a visit, and to take you by the hand and look into your face, before you went on your round-the-world trip.

But the fates seemed to rule otherwise, and instead of my health improving, the reverse appeared quite apparent during my four days' stay at the sea-side; so I concluded to let discretion be the better part of valor, and to make my way directly home, and bid Old Ocean a long and lasting farewell. As I stood and gazed in meditativ thought upon the briny flood dashing its surf far upward on the beach, to me it was sublimely grand.

And while thus in meditation I became somewhat en rapport mentally with a prehistoric people who lived in age of the world before science had made the discovery of the rotundity of the earth, and before anything was known about the law of gravitation, or the philosophy of storms in the elements was thought of, as being brought about by natural causes. These primitiv people, in their undeveloped mental unfoldment, concluded that there must be some superhuman being or beings somewhere that had a controling influence over those natural elements; so they personified those natural forces and called them God, or gods, and of course these gods were anthropoid in form and character, made and created after man's own form and likeness. In the beautiful words of a modern poet,

"'In the likeness of his maker man is made.'
Of some allowance this may well admit;
And man the great exemplar imitates
When he becomes the maker of his gods.
The image of himself he then adores,
In fancy's glass he views his inmost soul
Reflected dimly, and he knows it not;
But, as it is congenial to his taste,
Concludes that it must surely be divine,
And bows to the reflection of himself."

And here in these few thoughts we can trace the origin of all religions based on divine homage. All are alike earnest, all alike sincere, and all alike based on ignorance and superstition. They all must hav something supernatural, something superhuman, something that man as a human being and an intelligent thinker can know nothing about. And as it is now a well settled fact that the Christian religion is only an outgrowth of the more ancient forms of religion, it must take its place with the rest.

S. D. MOORE.

PITTSBURGH, PA., June 14, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Once more I hav the pleasure of sending you the name of a new subscriber, who has lately given up old monotonous and bigoted orthodoxy, and has come over to inhale some of the pure oxygen of liberty and to grow mentally strong under the bright sunshine of free thought and free speech. We are battling with the enemy here, slow but sure, as I believe the converts we hav made here are in earnest on the side of Liberalism. My friend whose subscription is inclosed is already a radical Freethinker, and like me he loves THE TRUTH SEEKER so that he reads it every word through as soon as time will permit, after getting it.

I notice by THE TRUTH SEEKER that the "V's" are coming in fast, and that your trip is now a settled fact. I hav now made up my mind that I must hav those two or three fat volumes, and now send you the required sum for that purpose and also to assist in moving you around among the orients, hoping that you will make the round trip safely and that you will giv every Liberal who wishes to buy it a history that will, if they use it right, giv other histories, gotten up from a Christian standpoint, such a knock-down that they will be away below par, and will never be able to mount the platform of defense again.

I hav no fear for THE TRUTH SEEKER in your absence. It was tried before and was not found wanting. I say it is bound to liv under the management of Mrs. Bennett and Mr. Macdonald, and with the letters of D. M. Bennett from abroad. Inclosed find $6.50—$5 to my name for your trip around the globe, and $1.50 for the paper to the new subscriber named.

Yours truly, H. B. MAXWELL.

ROSSVILLE, ILL., July 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find my "mite," the promised five dollars, which I hav neglected sending till this day. "Better late than never," however. You hav my best wishes for a safe and prosperous trip around the worlp. There are many anxious hearts praying for your safety and return from your journey. I remain yours truly, C. M. ROSS.

WEST RANDOLPH, VT., June 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for eight dollars; three of which are for your paper one year, from April 17, when my subscription expired, and the other five for the around-the-world fund, according to conditions, etc. I hope you will succeed in the undertaking, and be able to return to us with unimpaired health, to be at the helm to prosecute with renewed vigor the priests who now fatten upon the credulity of the people. I see even now that many are thinking for themselvs and do not believe the old, old story. Yet for the sake of gaining popularity many pander to to the aid of priestcraft and do not take our Liberal papers and books. Yet I find they are eager and willing to read my papers, etc., when I furnish them. Amidst it all I can see signs of promis for the future generations all over our fair land.

I wish you an abundant success. I am yours truly, SAMUEL BASS.

MILWAUKEE, OR., June 5, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am a sort of a border ruffian, and don't pretend to know much, having but little education. But as I am a Yankee I hav an idea, perhaps a new one. There is plenty of evidence here that the earth has more equators than one, and my geography used to teach me that the revolution of the earth drew the water upon the equator as the water is drawn upon the center of a grindstone by its revolution. If this is so, then the whole secret is made plain. Here we find old established beds of oysters at intervals of twenty-five or thirty feet, one above the other. We hav examined four distinct beds from fifteen to twenty inches in thickness, and it is probable that these distinct beds of oysters can be traced to the tops of our highest mountains. The last bed above tide-water is the most perfect, and of a much larger size than those at tide-water to-day, showing that the climate was warmer here when it was established. Hence it is plain that the sun is moving southward, or has been moving southward on this coast, and going, as the Yankees would say, "by jerks." I will not make a long argument with the geologists, who claim that these mountains hav been thrown up from the depths of the ocean, though I think I hav plenty of testimony in favor of my theory, but what I want is to hav you search, when you make the circuit of the earth, after the old legends that many of those old Eastern nations must hav, that their forefathers once dwelt in a beautiful land of plenty somewhere in the east. It is provable that the Chinese once dwelt in this country, for a bronze Chinese altar was exhumed in excavating for the N. P. R. R., with writing upon it which was deciphered by the Chinamen, and was by them conveyed with great care to their nativ land.

I don't think it will pay to try to destroy quite all of Noah's flood, though it might bear considerable pruning.

The paradisaical home of our forefathers, or Garden of Eden, will probably be found in Dakota, or the Red River country of the North. When the sun moved northward the aquatic animals were driven into the lands bordering on the Arctic Ocean, which accounts for the great abundance of ivory and aquatic fossils in those lands to-day. If I could hav time and space to tell you about Adam and Eve, and Abel's sheep business, and the reason why God would not accept of Cain's turnip and cabbage offering, it would be a story worth reading. But look out for Mother Shipton's sayings this year, for this tide-water bed of oysters is just about as well established as either of the other beds, and the jerk must come soon. Hav your arks ready and well stowed with grub and tobacco. E. W. CRESSEY.

CENTRAL, S. C., July 24, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I write this to say good-bye. Love and good wishes are all I can giv. Much as I regret your leaving us, I would freely send you $5 if I had it and thereby secure the history of your voyage, which will no doubt be worth three times the amount it will cost your donors. I am so glad you are going to hav company from home. It relieves me of half my regret for your going. Take good care of yourself, and right here let me suggest that you take a full suit of the "Wilsonia" to protect you from the effects of unavoidable exposures. Bring me a walking-stick from the Holy Land, even if it is nothing but a stalk of Jerusalem oak from round that old stable place where Christ was born, or may be you could get me a sprout from the stumps of that fig-tree which was struck by that big streak of cursing. I shall think of you often during your absence and look and long for your safe return. If you are successful and get home safe and then conclude to make a tour through the United States, I hope to be able to contribute my share to that enterprise.

Farewell. R. M. CASEY.

JORDAN VALLEY, OR., July 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will hav a safe journey, and I know you will, for "Yahveh" will take care not to lose so useful a man as D. M. Bennett. And if the ship should happen to wreck with you, he will probably hav a great whale created for you, as he did for Jonah, for "Yahweh" knows you are a more useful man than Jonah was. And if you should happen to get lost in some of those heathen countries you will surely not find any worse hell than the Christians hav prepared for you. Hoping you will hav a pleasant journey, and return safely,

I am yours truly, WM. R. KING.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., July 26, 1881.

FATHER BENNETT: Find inclosed one dollar for THE TRUTH SEEKER; wish I could send you one-half as much as I've expended for Jesus. I made up my mind that I had done more for him than he had for me, and I claim a balance in my favor; but he is exactly like his followers, and don't do what he agreed to, so I've dropped him from my list.

My experience is nearly the same as that of all in my circumstances. One example will tell the gist of the whole. Our minister told me in a puplic conference meeting, "I want you to sit down; we like to hav you come and hear what we hav to say, but we want you to keep your mouth shut."

But my mouth don't shut worth a cent, nor will it while prison doors stare us in the face for exercising our legal rights; and "do you know, Liberals, that we would" be an irresistible army of truth seekers if we were a little more concentrated?

I still say, "Bennett, don't go." But I suppose you will though; and you can put me down for the book of around the world, but don't send it till you get the "V," which I will remit as soon (at longest) as it is printed. My money is in the bank of heaven and I shall hav to raise it somewhere else, for I guess the "bank's broke." A. H. WALKER.

SOLEBURY, Feb. 27, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Feeling assured of your pardon for my levity in using to you so common a vulgar expression, let me say, I perceive you're a cunning old coon (jokingly). I think I understand you. Seeing there is no hope of life, immortality in Materialism, you consent to visit the ancient Garden of Eden so as to partake of the "tree of life in the midst thereof and eat and liv forever." Well, I am sure that I with your many friends hav not the least objection, but oh, how shocking to those who wish you dead already! Can you not accommodate them before you go? I say, No, but go and eat thereof and liv forever.

If I was not so old and poor,
I would help you on your way,
But I will often think of you
In reading what you say.
So make the trip around the world,
And tread on holy ground,
Then return to your dear home,
With all your treasures found.
Go see the beautiful Eden garden,
Once planted by the Lord,
Now held in durance, as we read,
By glittering two-edged sword.
Try to hav some talk with Satan,
If you can be so bold;
See if he really is a serpent, snake,
And if he's looking old;
Shake him gently by the tail,
And pat him on the back;
Ask him kindly for some fruit,
And put it in your sack.
You might whisper in his ear
A word or two of praise;
We think him better than his god
In many of his ways!
You need not tell him all you know,
For that would raise his ire
To drive you from the garden,
And cast you in his fire.
Do not neglect the tree of life,
But treat it kindly, clever;
Try to get some fruit thereof,
And eat and liv forever.

Respectfully, H. W. ALLEN.

Consistency, thou art called a jewel,
Not here portrayed to view,
By one that's called the wisest man
The world has ever knew:

"Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding" (Prov. iii, 13). "For in much wisdom is much grief; and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow!" (Eccl. i, 18.)

Old fashionable theological religion is now about losing its last hold on intelligent minds; its doom is sealed as a thing of the past, its priests and priestly rule must go to the wall, being weighed in the balance and found wanting; the light of scientific knowledge has eclipsed the splendor of its brightness; its mock sun must go down in gloom to welter in the blood of its slain!

Then shout, ye nations of the earth,
And let your voices ring;
The year of jubilee has come,
So all the world may sing,
Science god is king!

E. W. A.

FOREST GROVE, OR., July 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: It is rather late on my part in sending in my "V" pledge, but circumstances sometimes interfere with plans, so I will not tender any apology, but instead inclose postal order for $8—$3 to apply on the subscription of Mr. Bisbee of this place and the balance to apply to your missionary trip. I will giv another "V" if you will take Comstock the sneak along with you and cast him in ye Daniel's lion's den. I hav great doubts about any respectable lion making a meal off Comstock. No, I hav a better opinion of a lion or any other animal than to think they would giv Comstock even a passing glance. I hav a favor to ask of you which I hope that you will grant. Will you kindly forward to me one of those rocks that Joshua, God & Co. caused to be rained down from heaven upon men who were bravely defending their homes against a band of wandering (according to the Bible) robbers. I am not a lover of the (Bible) land, but I would like to hav one of those mythical rocks. It strikes me as very strange that Christians will persecute people who do not believe such infamous heathenish stories about their God. Instead of persecuting unbelievers Christians should giv them credit. Wishing you a grand success, I remain, Your Infidel friend,

W. C. CLOW.

God's Doings.

God made this world himself alone,
With no one to assist him,
And then upon the other hand,
There were none to resist him.
He made the world for our own use,
We could not liv without it,
And so he made it very quick,
Was just six days about it.

He made the sun and moon and stars
And placed them all in order,
And spread a curtain over all,
With a star-spangled border.
He made an Indian and a squaw,
And placed them in the bushes,
And taught them how to get their food
By catching fowls and fishes.

And then he made another pair,
And called them Eve and Adam,
When they'd been here a few short years
He wished the devil had 'em.
And then God sent old Satan down,
With Mother Eve to grapple,
And Satan turned into a snake,
And offered her an apple.

She took the apple, ate it all
But just the core and paring,
And those she gave to her old man,
And that set him to swearing.
So now we all must go to hell,
With devils there to grapple,
Because six thousand years ago
Our parents ate that apple.

God made ten thousand little things,
Black, yellow, green, and red bugs,
And then he made two species more,
We call them fleas and bed-bugs.
He made ten thousand little things,
Thousands of little midgets.
They bite our dear sweet babies so
Their mothers get the fidgets.

God made ten thousand little things,
Thousands of little creatures,
No man could either name them all
Or know them by their features.
The book we call the Bible here,
If you would read its contents,
One half we find is decent good,
The other half is nonsense.

There is no devil in the world,
In no dark place he lurches,
He has no refuge anywhere,
Excepting in the churches.
The priests may keep the devil there,
They think it very funny;
So long as they make them believe
They'll grab the people's money.

They may hear and pay them too,
Yes, every one that pleases;
In spite of this they can't get mine,
Till melted brimstone freezes.
Now take a peep at Plymouth church,
Behold their godly teacher;
There's no worse devil in the world
Than their beloved Beecher.

And when all find he's lied like hell,
And none believe his story,
He'll take a rope and hang himself,
And swing right into glory.

The Liberals' Warning to Uncle Sam.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Our lovely goddess, Liberty,
After a long and weary strife,
Was won by thee, dear Uncle Sam,
And thou didst take her for thy wife.

We grieve to think that thou dost flirt
With Mother Church so thoughtlessly,
Forgetful of that lovely one
Who has been always true to thee.

Old Mother Church has mistress been
Of kings of Spain, and John Bull too—
The concubine of ancient kings,
And history proves this statement true.

And 'tis well known that in those times
When kings and church were joined in one
The land ran red with human gore
And rights of conscience trampled on.

When king of France and pope of Rome
Conspired the heretics to slaughter
On fatal Saint Bartholomew,
Then ran human blood like water.

Our priests charge this to popery,
To do such deeds they would disdain;
A glance in history will show
Servetus was by Calvin slain.

Read church of England history,
Their foolish nonconformists' war;
They prosecuted Puritans
And drove them to this land afar.

Did then all prosecution end?
Oh, no; for Puritans then turned
And Quakers hung for love of God,
And Baptists fined and witches burned.

The old Blue laws hav been enforced,
And Kneeland thrust in prison cell;
The church on steamboats now makes war,
And railway trains would stop as well.

And she declares the mails are hers,
All through this land, o'er hill and dale;
To what she wants men must respond,
Or she will pop them right in jail.

The fact is this, our churches here
From Romish church are but a shoot;
It makes no difference their name,
They all agree to prosecute.

So, Uncle Sam, be not deceived;
Her crimson skirts of bright array
Are red with blood of martyred men—
Reformers who opposed her sway.

Her pious mien, her gentle words,
Hide worse than the most vile of beasts;
The seeming whiteness of her skin
but whitewash daubed on by priests.

Then, Uncle Sam, be warned in time
Before you feel her deadly clutch;
Where she gets power, then freedom dies,
And science withers at her touch.

Don't yield to her a single inch;
Giv her not our Constitution,
In which to put her God, and thus
Make it a priestly institution;

But cling to lovely Liberty;
From her true love be never parted,
Nor grieve her more by flirting o'er
One that's so vile and bloody-hearted.

Oh, hark not to church, priests, or pimps,
Who on freedom's cause would tread,
For they would slay thee, Uncle Sam;
They'd laugh if liberty was dead.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.
REPLIES TO THE
"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."
By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CHRISTIANITY
FROM A
Scientific and Historical Standpoint.
BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.
The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.
Only Article of the Kind in Use.
Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last I have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. P. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.
Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet to-day what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.
Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

[Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.]

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfulls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.
Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.
Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 20, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No: I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carman said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.
Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.
Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.
Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,
MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed intochronic rheumatism I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.
I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a bett r appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel be ter, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,
MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.
I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apopiexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.
Desirous of knowing what Dr. Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.
MRS. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."
I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as YOU DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.
God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.
Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME.

FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.
I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complain in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,
Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

Gems of Thought.

THE Methodist condemns the Catholic for believing too implicitly, too entirely, in his leaders and his church dogmas, while the Atheist knows that they are each and all of them dupes and victims of old superstitions, traditions, and teachings perpetuated by false education and unfavorable social influences.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE pure scientists object to anything being called facts in human experience which are not reducible to sensible terms. They are not facts such as science contemplates. Their value to religion or to religionists they may not deny, but they complain bitterly of any attempt to confound science with mental philosophy. They study the brain, but not the soul. They observe and respect what can be weighed, measured, or subjected to physical tests, but leave all that is beyond this—and that is the best and highest—to the speculativ thoughts of men, who must be contented with something short of what they call scientific knowledge.—Rev. H. W. Bellows.

PROTESTANT as well as Catholic Christianity discourages investigation and love of truth by instilling into the mind unmanly fears respecting the consequences of coming to conclusions in conflict with accepted dogmas. How can a man educated to believe a system that forbids doubting—the beginning of wisdom—regarding its truth, make an impartial examination of its claims, or the claims of other systems opposed to it, or investigate, without fear or favor, questions that are related to it?—B. F. Underwood.

HUMAN nature is, we admit, so capricious that there may be a single sensitiv point in a conscience which everywhere else is callous. A man without truth or humanity may hav some strange scruples about a trifle. There was one devout warrior in the royal camp whose piety bore a great resemblance to that which is ascribed to the king. We mean Colonel Turner. That gallant cavalier was hanged, after the Restoration, for a flagitous burglary. At the gallows he told the crowd that his mind received great consolation from one reflection—he had always taken off his hat when he went into a church.—Macaulay.

MEN differ in opinions as much as in features. No two minds are perfectly accordant. The shades of belief are infinitly diversified. Amidst this immense variety of sentiment, every man is right in his own eyes. Every man discovers errors in the creed of his brother. Every man is prone to magnify the importance of his own peculiarities and to discover danger in the peculiarities of others. This is human nature.—Dr. Channing.

EVEN our enemies are beginning to admit that the secularist life may be as pure in aim and aspiration as theirs. They are ceasing to point to men as false and dishonest because they are Secularists or Materialists, Agnostics, or even Atheists. But the constant cry is that morality is not enough. A pure, honest, workful life is not sufficient. There must be a belief in God; nay, in this country there must be a belief in Christ and his blood, if a man's life is to be a true life. He may be the faithfulest of husbands, the gentlest and firmest of fathers, most honest and painstaking in business, one against whom no breath of censure stirs. That is not enough. The Christian shakes his head doggedly and says: "All this is of no avail. He does not believe in the saving power of the blood of Jesus Christ."—Dr. Aveling's Superstitions.

WHAT signifies his barren shine
Of moral powers and reason?
His English style an' gesture fine
Are a' clean out of reason.
Like Socrates or Antonine,
Or some old pagan heathen,
The moral man he does define,
But ne'er a word o' faith in 't
That's right that day. —Burns.

WHO would not rather be damned with intellectual, moral men and women, whose chief crime is that they are independent and courageous enough to examin the faith of their ancestors and to reject whatever seems contrary to their reason and their sense of right, however consecrated by time, than to be saved with the ignorant and the vicious, whose principal merit consists in their declining to doubt or to investigate, in their adhering firmly to the religion taught them in childhood, and their confidence that the blood of Jesus has the virtue to wash away all their sins and fit them for the mansion of the blest! Who, I say, would not rather be damned with the former than be saved with the latter?—Underwood's Christianity and Materialism.

IF you want to hav better men and women, change their condition here. Don't promis them something somewhere else. One biscuit will do more good than all the tracts that were ever published in the world. Giv them more whitewash, more light, more air. You hav to change men physically before you change them intellectually. I believe the time will come when every criminal will be treated as we now treat the diseased and sick, when every penitentiary will become a reformatory, and that if criminals go to them with hatred in their bosoms they will leave them without feelings of revenge.—Ingersoll's Hell.

I LOVE the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distrsss, and grow brave by reflection. 'Tis the business of little minds to shrink; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death. He that rebels against reason is a real rebel; but he that, in defense of reason, rebels against tyranny, has a better title to "Defender of the Faith" than George the Third.—Thomas Paine.

O WAD some power the giftie gie us
To see ourels as others see us!
It wad frae many a blunder free us
And foolish notion.
What airs in dress and gait wad leave us,
And e'en devotion! —Burns.

Odds and Ends.

A HANDSOME lady entered a dry-goods store and inquired for a "bow." The polite clerk threw himself back and remarked that he was at her service. "Yes, but I want a buff not a green one," was the reply. The young man went on measuring goods immediately.

"FATHER," asked little Johnny, "when you was a boy did you used to think what a great man you would be when you grew up?" "I suppose so," said his father, "why do you ask that?" "I don't know," replied Johnny, "only I heard you say last night that life was full of disappointments; that was all."

"WOULD you like to look at some mourning goods?" asked the polite dry-goods clerk, as he flung down some slazy black fabrics before a serious lady customer. "No, not this morning; some other morning; good morning," she responded; and the clerk was so overcome that he was shortly afterward carried out to his bier.

A YOUNG man has just been married. On the evening of the happy day he observes his bride carefully restoring her bouquet of orange blossoms within a globe of glass prepared for the purpose. Much surprised, he inquires the reason. She, with a charming smile, replies, "But, my dear, I may be able to keep it for the next."—From the French.

"WHAT," asked Lampy, pausing in the middle of a mischievous article on the annex, "is the difference between a boarding-school miss twelve months before marriage and the same individual twelve months after the ceremony?" "About two years," said the Ibis, mournfully viewing the sad-eyed censor returning from an algebra examination. "Nay," replied the jester, "one husbands her bang, the other bangs her husband.—Harvard Lampoon.

HE saw a carpet hanging out
Upon a clothes-line in the rear
Of that fine mansion, and he thought,
"The folks are out, the coast is clear;
I'll bag that Brussels if I can."
He did, and, making no delay,
Adown the alley, in the dusk,
The carpet-bagger tramped away.

WHEN you go to court your girl, young man,
Keep getting bolder and bolder,
And when the propitious moment comes,
Right in your arms enfold her—— and ask her if you dare hope to, some time in the sugar-coated futurity, swear her in to get up on cold mornings and start the fire, while you hold a private seance with old Morpheus pending breakfast.

NOT FOR THE REVISED VERSION.

How dear to my heart was the old family Bible,
That stood on the table so solemn and still,
Where often I've bid anything I thought liable
To get in the hands of my brother Bill.

How ardent I've seized it with eyes that were glowing,
And shook its wide pages till out the things fell;
But now all its charming old secrecy's going,
With this new-fangled Bible the bookstores all sell,
The new-fangled Bible, the twenty-cent Bible,
This reverend Bible that says hades for hell.

SHE DIDN'T KNOW.

Miss Pallas Eudora Von Blurky,
She didn't know chickens from turkey;
High Spanish and Greek
She could fluently speak,
But her knowledge of poultry was murky.

She could tell the great uncle of Moses,
And the dates of the wars of the roses,
And the reason of things—
Why the Indians wore rings
In their red, aboriginal noses.

Why Shakspere was wrong in his grammar,
And the meaning of Emerson's "Brahma,"
And she went chopping rocks
With a little black box
And a small geological hammer.

She had views upon co-education,
And the principal needs of the nation,
And her glasses were blue,
And the number she knew
Of the stars in each high constellation.

And she wrote in a handwriting clerky,
And she talked with an emphasis jerky,
And she painted on tiles
In the sweetest of styles,
But she didn't know chicken from turkey.
—Tom Ochiltree.

A QUESTION FOR THE BACHELORS.

Where do old bachelors go—when they die?
Where do the bachelors go?
Do their souls take flight to the realms on high,
Or to darker regions below?
Old maids with their follies and whims
Climb up the golden stairs;
Where do old bachelors go with their sins?
Sweet echo answers, Where?

When from this dreamy world they skip,
Do they think of their ill-spent youth?
Do they ever think of the rosy lips
They never kissed?—in truth.
No curtain lectures, no little storms,
To burst over them now and then;
No making up in each other's arms,
To love but to quarrel again.

They liv on earth in a negativ state,
In hunger and thirst and cold;
In a state of unrest in the tide of faith,
A poverty of the soul;
They call it happiness, because
They enjoy it—and so it is—
For 'tis merely short suspension of laws
That punish—and that is bliss.

Old bachelors go to—well, when they die,
We know where the bachelors go;
Old maids shall pile the embers high
Far down in their quarters below.
"We might hav been married," they cry aloud,
And look up from the regions dark,
"Then we could swing on a rosy cloud
And play on a golden harp." —Becky Sharp.

Notes and Clippings.

AN ex-female is the term applied by the Philadelphia Press to Mrs. Victoria Woodhull.

A STRIP of land one inch wide and three hundred feet long was sold in Milwaukee for $1,500.

NEARLY all the persons miraculously cured by prayer at Pink Cottage, the hospital of the Rev. George O. Barnes, in Kentucky, hav since died, and these mishaps hav closed the concern.

FATHER RYAN, a Roman Catholic pastor at Cromwell, Conn., who fell in love with a girl and became a drunkard, has contritely turned all his property over to his bishop and retired to a monastery.

THERE is trouble in the Methodist church at Hickory Point, Illinois, because cigars were sold at the Sunday-school festival to small boys, several of whom indulged in their first smoke on that occasion.

REPORTS from Kansas cities agree that the prohibitory liquor law passed last winter is already disregarded. All the saloons were closed a while, but they are now open, and the traffic suffers no interference.

THE John Allen case of twelve years ago in this city now has a counterpart in Chicago, except that instead of a "wickedest man," the person of supreme debasement is Minnie Brooks, in whose dance-house revival meetings are held.

UNDER the new khedivial decree abolishing slavery in Egypt, domestic slavery in future will be rendered impossible. Families possessing slaves now are not to be deprived of their property in them, but no new slaves are to be admitted.

A METHODIST camp-meeting near New Canaan, Conn., announces as one of its advantages that "a commodious ice house has been erected on the grounds." It is not stated whether this is for the storage of ice or for the accommodation of brethren who grow too enthusiastic and who need cooling off.

THE St. James's Gazette tells of a Nihilistic beer shop in Rose street, Soho, where the subversion of law and order is advocated in the following song:

A stands for Alexander, who was killed the other day;
If his son don't alter he'll be killed in the same way.

ELDER ATWATER, a Wisconsin Methodist preacher, affected the Peter Cartwright style of evangelism, and gained an enviable reputation for piety and eloquence; but his downfall has been caused by a committee, who watched his conduct at a camp-meeting and made discoveries which confirmed their worst suspicions.

IT is impossible to satisfy some men. No matter how much they hav they want more. They are like the little boy who had gorged himself at dinner, but still begged for a piece of custard pudding. "But, my dear," said his mother, "you are so full now that you can hardly speak." The youthful prodigy replied, "Mother, the apple-dumpling side of my stomach is full, but the custard-pudding side is empty."

THE increase of wealth from 1860 to 1870 was over 114 per cent. The increase of population during the same period was less than 23 percent. Thus the increase of wealth in ten years was 91 per cent greater that the increase of population. And yet the great mass of people were no better off in 1870 than in 1860, and poverty and crime were more widespread. Who got the 91 per cent of increase and how did he, they, or it get it?

IT is difficult to imagin a multitude of sane people gathering together to hear a D. D. discuss plans for raising money in Sabbath-schools for foreign mission work. But that is the way part of the day was spent the other day at Chautauqua. There are plenty of "heathen" at home uncared for, but it is not perhaps the heathen brother abroad that the good men at Chautauqua care for so much as the brethren who are to handle the money raised in the Sabbath-schools.

A MORMON conferenee is to be held in Georgia. This announcement confirms the reports of numerous conversions to Mormonism in the mountain districts of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennesee, where exhorters from Salt Lake hav been zealously at work for several years. These men preach polygamy, but advise the converts not to practice it until they migrate to Utah. It is said, however, that among Georgia Mormons a plurality of wives is not uncommon.

COL. INGERSOLL says: "Rev. Dr. Newman, of New York, tells us that the crime of Guiteau shows three things: first, that ignorant men should not be allowed to vote; second, that foreigners should not be allowed to vote; and, third, that there should not be so much religious liberty. It turns out, first, that Guiteau is not an ignorant man; second, that he is not a foreigner; and, third, that he is a Christian. Now, because an intelligent American Christian tries to murder the President, this parson says that we ought to do something with ignorant foreigners and Infidels. This about the average pulpit logic."

THE London Daily News says: "Mr. Bradlaugh's case will be immediately considered by the Cabinet council. A ministerial statement on the subject is expected before the close of the session. We are informed that Mr. Bradlaugh will take no further steps pending the hearing upon the summons. We hav always maintained, in accordance with the opinion of Lord Selbourne, the law officers of the crown, the late attorney-general, and a majority of lawyers, that the right claimed by the House of Commons is one which does not belong to it, which it never exercised before, and which, sooner or later, must, if persisted in, bring it into serious conflict with the constituencies. Mr. Bradlaugh's own imprudence cannot alter the fact that he has been treated with the grossest injustice, and that he represent a principle of the highest political importance."

FATHER KALLENBERG is pastor of St. Michael's Catholic church at Miamisburg, Ohio. Pete Eagle is an ex-sheriff and of considerable weight in the community. He and his wife belonged to St. Michael's. Mrs. Eagle accused the priest of attempting to kiss her, and similar charges were made by other women; but none of the accusers would appear before the official whom the bishop sent to investigate the scandal, and therefore the matter was dropped. Mrs. Eagle was absent from the services awhile, but last Sunday a new church was to be dedicated, and she went to attend the services. Father Kallenberg met her in the aisle, and, in hearing of the congregation, asked why she had come. She went home immediately. Then Pete Eagel sought the clergyman, and exacted, by means of a threat to whip him, something that served for an apology. Both men are now going armed for a fight.

AN unexplained objection to the electric light arises from its alleged evil effects on the eyes. European observers state that the frequent variations in intensity to which the light is subject giv rise to sudden and frequent changes in the pupil, and, consequently, in the "accommodation" of the eye, by which is meant that alternate contraction and dilation of the pupil, by which it suits itself to the variations of light. Such a light, therefore, causes not only muscular fatigue, but also a consider able degree of blurring and indistinctness in the retinal image. The light suffers both when it is too dim and when it is too bright. In the former case the object must be brought close to be clearly seen, and an increased accommodativ effort is called for, which in most case results in nearsightedness. In the latter case, the simple intensity of the light produces undue contraction of the pupil, and an increase of tension within the eye.

THE quiet old town of Davenport, Iowa, has recently been seriously agitated over a scandal which has just come to light. The facts in the case are as follows: one Rev. Mr. Wilson, a Baptist preacher, has been charged with taking improper liberties, and finally culminating in attempting to commit rape on one of the members of his church, Mrs. Bush, a lady of very good character, who has been holding official positions in the church, and a leader in society. The case is now in progress in the courts. A large amount of evidence has been given seriously reflecting on the character of many of the church-members, and also bringing in the good names of previous pastors who hav not always used the best discretion when in company with their weak sisters. The church is divided, as usual in such trials, the pastor having the largest portion; not only that, but he has the sympathy and support of a portion of the press, the churches generally, and the Y. M. C. A. Their influence is so potent that probably the pastor will go free and the injured woman will receive censure from the people.

IT is announced that the Rev. H. W. Thomas, of Chicago, is to be tried in September for heterodoxy as to the atonement and the inspiration of the scriptures. It is also announced that he has "left the Methodist Episcopal church." There seems to be some confusion as to his standing. For some time he has been preaching as an independent minister. If it shall be definitly ascertained that he has severed his connection with the Methodist Episcopal church it will be superfluous for the court of that church to attempt to try him. The points on which charges of heterodoxy are made out are exceedingly nice, and are based on expression in his sermons, many of which are capable of being explained in different ways. It is claimed by his friends that there are many in the Methodist church who are quite as heterodox as Dr. Thomas is accused of being. And it is urged that if he be tried there ought to be a general and comprehensiv trial of all who hav in any degree wandered from the standards of the Methodist Episcopal church. Such a trial would produce a theological earthquake, and would introduce more dissensions than fifty ecumenical councils could heal.

REV. DAVID TICE, Methodist, of Stillwater, Minn., has been persecuting a poor cripple who keeps a peanut-stand on Third street, in that town. He lodged a complaint against and arrested him several times for doing business on Sunday, the same as dozens of others in town there and elsewhere are making a regular practice of doing, and in which they are countenanced and upheld by public opinion and officers of the law; but Tice, one of the Comstock style of virtuous seekers after notoriety, and whose hypocrisy can be seen in every word and motion by any ordinarily keen-eyed observer, must look after the morals of this poor cripple—not daring to attack any abler—and hav him fined to help his morality. His first fine the citizens clubbed together and paid. His second fine was ten cents, the situation having come to the knowledge of the judge as it should, and it being the duty of the court to impose some fine to meet the requirements of the law; that is, honored more in the breach than the observance. The local papers, and even those of towns like St. Paul, adjacent, hav passed very severe strictures upon the conduct of the "self-appointed," and given him notoriety, though of a not at all pleasant kind to any one but such abnormal creations as Tice, Comstock, etc. It is hoped he will hav sense enough to crawl into his moss-grown fossil of Methodism and content himself with mauling the "revised" or some more antequated edition of "God's word."

CHAPTER VI.

Often I was in the amphitheater; often I passed through the street of Albertas. I saw her no more. Her picture floated before me and mixed itself with my dreams. I lost all hope to see the beautiful vision again, but not my longing.

The time came that I was to enter the university at Montpellier. Mr. Etienne repeated to me his wishes, and conjured me not to disappoint his expectations. In the superabundance of his confidence in my young powers he saw in me the future guardian angel of the Protestant church of France.

He blessed me. The whole family stood weeping around me at my departure. I promised in all vacations to come to Nismes, and left, overwhelmed with grief.

From Nismes to Montpellier are eight full leagues. I wandered in the shade of mulberry-trees between golden grain and beautiful wine-gardens along the chain of hills above which rise the gray Cevennes. But the air glowed, and the earth burned beneath my feet. After three hours I sank down, worn out, at the banks of the Vidourle, in the shade of a neat villa and its chestnut-trees.

I meditated over my past and my future. I calculated what I had lived, and what a space of time, according to the common measure, would yet be left for me to labor. I found still forty years, and for the first time shuddered at the shortness of our days. The oak upon the mountain needs for its development a century, and stands yet another in the prime of its strength. And man's existence so fleeting! And why? What shall he do with his numerous talents? Not a long, but a rich life was by nature given to man. The thought consoled me. Well then, thought I, four decades more, and thou standest, a more perfect one, where thy father stands.

So I gradually fell asleep under these thoughts. In my dream I was an aged man, my limbs heavier, my hair white. The thousands of fine pores of the physical body, through which it unfelt inhales power of life, and nourishes itself from the elements, had withered. With the ceasing flow of the matter of life ceased the power of the muscles, and the tender parts, which we call its tools, gradually hardened and closed themselvs. I heard the world no longer, and soon my eyesight also became extinct. While thus the senses died away with which the spirit takes root in the earthly the emotions grew weaker, all perceptions feebler, and all that which was formerly conducted through the busy senses to the spirit was lost. I had my corpse no longer under full control, and forgot the names of things and their use. I was fed by others, and dressed and undressed, and treated as children are treated. I could yet talk, but the words often failed me, and I spoke sometimes that which nobody could comprehend. Yet I thought and felt, though without regret, that I no longer belonged to the earth. But soon I did not even think any more in words; it was only a motionless, still, nominal feeling of my being. This being, eternally monotonous, with entire absence of anything from without, was without weal and without woe; there was in it no change of thought, hence no results, and no more time. Enough! I was dead long ago, my corpse a long, long time buried and moldered for centuries. Only upon earth, where we count the changes of things, are centuries, and the succession of events produces in us the idea of time. Separated from all change, there is in existence no time.

An agreeable, dark sensation now took possession of me. My hitherto isolated spirit became connected with new instruments, to be working in the universe upon the universe. I felt gradually more distinct, and heard a mild rustling, and felt an agreeable freshness about me. Before me floated golden, dazzling beams, and silvery clouds danced along. I lowered the astonished look into the bright, transparent green of trees surrounding me, which, like colored air, swam in the crystal-clear ether. And between the branches and the clouds stood Clementine, motionless, shining brilliantly in unspeakable beauty, a wreath of young flowers about her dark hair.

She smiled at me. So smiles only love in its innocence. She took the wreath from out her hair, and swung it in her tender hand, and it sank upon my breast.

"O thou heavenly dream, do not leave me!" thought I, and stared in nameless rapture at the beautiful vision.

At this I heard a sound, as of a wagon rolling by. Clementine's countenance darkened. Her name was called.

"Farewell, Alamontada!" said she, and vanished among the trembling twigs.

I was at that moment about to sink at her feet. But I lay upon the ground. I was not in a dream, for I recognized the Vidourle and the villa darkened by high chestnut-trees.

I raised myself up. A wagon thundred over the bridge. I hurried thither. An old servant met me, and asked whether I desired refreshments. I expressed my astonishment to him. "Are you not Mr. Alamontada?" said he. I replied in the affirmativ. "Now, Miss de Sonnes and her mother hav left the order with me," answered he. I went back, took Clementine's wreath from the ground, and followed the servant. Clementine was Miss de Sonnes.

This day will never be forgotten as one of the most beautiful of my life.

CHAPTER VII.

An attic room in the rear house of one of the richest and happiest inhabitants of Montpellier, Mr. Bertollou, became my abode. Some roofs, black walls, and two windows, and the attic of a house standing on the opposit street, was my scanty view. Nevertheless I was happy. Surrounded by my books, I lived only for the sciences, and Clementine's wreath hung above my writing-desk. Spring's myriads of blossoms lost their brightness beside the charms of these withered flowers, and the weight of the queen's jewels could not pay me the value of the slightest citron-leaf thereof.

Clementine became my saint. I loved her with a pious veneration—as one loves supernatural beings. The suspended wreath was my relic, which an angel had thrown down to me from heaven. I saw her, in the glory of transfiguration, go through my dreams. Her name resounded in my songs. I awaited with trembling and longing the vacation of the university, in order to see my uncle Etienne and Nismes, and perhaps through some lucky accident to see the loved saint again.

One day the door of my study-room was opened. A young, handsome man entered to inspect the room. It was Mr. Bertollou. "You hav here an unpleasant view!" said he, and stepped to the window; "yet yonder still a little piece of the house of De Sonnes, one of the most tasteful in the whole city!" he added smilingly.

The name De Sonnes made me tremble. Mr. Bertollou remained meditatingly at the window and appeared to become sad. I began a conversation. He asked me about my origin and my knowledge. "How," said he, "you play the harp? And you love it passionately, without possessing an instrument?"

"I am too poor, sir, to buy one myself. My little money is hardly sufficient for the necessary books."

"My wife has two harps. She can well do without one of them!" he answered, and left me.

Within an hour the harp came. How happy was I! Now I thought of Clementine and touched the strings. Emotions are speechless; for thoughts the proper words hav been invented; for the feelings of the heart, melodious sounds.

The following morning came the amiable Bertollou. I thanked him moved. He asked me to play. I played and thought of Clementine. He leaned with his forehead against the window and stared gloomily over the roofs. My soul drowned in the abundance of harmonies. I did not notice that he turned around and listening stood near me.

"You are a dear enchanter!" exclaimed he, and embraced me with violence; "we two must become friends!"

I was his already; we became so still more in the course of a few weeks. In fine weather I had to accompany him on all his little pleasure rides. He introduced me to numerous acquaintances. Every one treated me with respect and distinction. He was the owner of a respectable library and a rich natural collection. He entrusted to me the management of these, and seemed to hav chosen this means only to relieve my poverty through a considerable salary for the little trouble without offending my feelings.

Bertollou was, in more than one respect, an excellent man. He possessed knowledge, wit, and power of persuasion; he charmed through his gentleness and goodness; in companies he was the genius of joy; his aim was the respect of his fellow-citizens. He had already declined several public offices with a modesty that made him still more worthy of the general confidence. He was very rich, copartner of a large mercantil house, possessed one of the most agreeable villas on the hights of the opposite village, Costelnau, and was the husband of the most beautiful wife of Montpellier. Generally his wife lived in the villa; only in winter she removed to the town. Bertollou saw her seldom. Not love, but convenience and interest seemed to hav closed this alliance.

What to me made this man of still more importance was his being free from all prejudices. Bigotry and religious fanaticism pervaded the whole town; only he made a rare exception. Nevertheless, he visited most regularly the masses, and was even member of the brotherhood of the penitent. "'Tis such a little," said he, "to win the favor of mankind. If one only does homage to their prejudices, if he cannot attack and conquer them, he is the man of all hearts. He who makes open war upon the prejudices is just as much an enthusiast as the one who defends them with all weapons."

We, notwithstanding, often had our friendly quarrels. He termed the destiny of man blissfulness, and knew no limits to the selection of the means to this end. He mocked at my lively zeal for virtue, called it a work of social regulation, and proved to me that it, among different nations, also bears different colors. His wit sometimes even made me ridiculous in my own eyes, while he suffered one of my principal virtues to wander to different nations and everywhere ridiculed it.

And yet Bertollou was, in spite of these prejudices, dear to me; for everywhere he did good.

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

As the world gained in knowledge so also did the Jews, and the conception of deity rose higher and higher. But the credit of reform was not due to the priests, but to the poets, who were called by them prophets. We find the poets of all lands gifted and in communion with nature, and opposed to priestcraft. Their ideas are the best moral lessons in the oriental writings. Sir William Jones asserts that from the Mediterranean to China all countries that lie between are indebted to the poets for their sublimest and most moral ideas.

By persistent agitation the God of Israel was so modified as to be satisfied with a lamb or ox or a small sum of money in lieu of the first-born. After the captivity he was tamed down and ceased to be a wonder-worker. A sin-offering dwindled to a scapegoat, who was let free. Barabbas is a modification of this idea.

But the Christians hav resuscitated the idea in its worst form. Jehovah must be appeased by a human sacrifice. And those who revile and decry these atrocious and heathenish ideas in others hav incarnated and humanized Hü, the sun-god, hav adopted the mythical sacrifice of Hü as the only begotten of Sadwrn or Jehovah, and incorporated it as the chief article of their faith. Jehovah demands a sacrifice once for all and then rests satisfied forever.

It seems comical to a person who understands the relations between the God and devil of the Christians, when they praise God who has sent his blessed son into the world to save it. Which world? If he sent his blessed son into this world to chase out the Evil One, also his son, we would be thankful. But the devil is the grand essential of priestcraft.

Possibly some hot-headed Christians may take offense at the fearless and analytical manner in which we discuss their Jehovah, the Jewish deity. To such I say, Keep your temper. As an initiated bard of the Druidic order, I well understand what I speak of, and am prepared to prove that the most notable gods of the orientals are only the symbols and bardic myths of the Gorsedh deified. In proof, let me show that 3,300 years ago Vyasa, compiler of the Vedas, said when Jamadagni, chief bard of the White Isle (Sweta Dwipa), speaks all the gods of the earth tremble and submit.

It was a sad time for humanity when the devil was instituted and finally elevated as the god who delighted in sacrifice, and who is still worshiped as the God of Israel. Still sadder the fact that European nations hav elevated him to the position of supreme being, that they call him the god of battles, and teach that is his sole prerogativ, and that he commanded and was responsible for all the atrocities committed in Palestine in his name, deeds of cruelty, dishonesty, and enslavement of humanity. Through this idea war has been sanctified and religious persecution justified. And as the Jews claimed Palestine in the name of Jehovah, so also the Christians claim the lands of the whole world upon the principle that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, and all nations who do not worship Jehovah hav no rights that Christians are bound to respect. Why has Jehovah any more rights than Brahma or the god of the Aryans? Why do different titles of the sun giv greater powers, or any authority to steal the lands of weaker nations? The two great divisions, Jews excepted, who now contest the possession of the globe are Christians and Mohammedans, and since history began there never were two greater disturbers of the public peace than these two sects; never any sect so fanatical for their creed, so ready to fight and shed blood to establish it, to impose taxes upon the public, to uphold slavery in its worst form, to hinder all aspirations for liberty, and to condemn and destroy natural emotions and feelings. O Religion, what a hell thou hast made the world, with discussion, oppression, persecution, slaughter, and burning at the stake in all eras, especially the Christian, and all for creed's sake!

Better for the world if no conception of deity had ever been than such a deity, who delights in practices which cannot be tolerated in our fellow-men. But as the Father persecutes his children eternally in hell, and manifests such a disposition, what else can be expected of his progeny?

The true philosopher has no need of god or devil; sufficient for him is the knowledge of two great principles, good and evil, which often blend, and work together for the common benefit. If for society's sake a god is necessary, let it be a god of love and goodness, the sublimest ideal of purity, in contradistinction to a devil, who is all that is evil.

In oriental myths, and in the Puranas and Vedas, as stated before, this idea of atonement sprung from the idea of the sun being sacrificed annually. But the Druidic bardism never esteemed this to be either a moral or spiritual idea of atonement, but simply a natural fact. Through his death and resurrection all nature was preserved through the adverse forces of winter to blossom in spring, and giv joy and blessing to man. Hence Hü was a savior, and the son of the black virgin (winter.) Coming forth annually in his might and glory as the lamb (Aries) in March, and the lion of the tribe of Judah in summer (Hü Dad in Leo), sinking into the lap of the virgin (Virgo), and dying upon the gallows (Libra), passing through hell (winter) to resurrection,

> Who is this that comes from Edom,
> All his garments dyed in blood,
> To the slave proclaiming freedom,
> Bringing and bestowing good?

As a conquerer he emerges from Arthan, and as Edom is red so red was the Typhonic or Arthanic hue, as also was Bosrah where the same idea is represented. Here he crushes the head of the serpent (Scorpio), and proves that he is superior to death and hell.

The same power is attributed in a higher sense to the influence of Hü in the metempsychical idea, but this idea has been so utterly debased as to be scarcely recognizable. The Jews esteemed Jehovah as a savior in time of trouble, war, pestilence, etc. But the Christians hav made him a spiritual savior who takes upon him the sins of the whole world. Sin as much as you like, only believe, and you shall be saved, aye, even at the eleventh hour. Jesus bears it all; no matter what you do, you shall go scot-free. What a demoralizing doctrin! This idea is not susceptible of proof, but if they held him up as a savior in physical trouble, his efficacy would be tested and found worthless.

The bards, in their myth of the death of Hü upon the gallows, did not hold that he died as an atonement to God, but to the Destroyer, the principle of darkness, Death; that it was a natural necessity that he should annually lose his energy, youth, and power, to die, and be resurrected, born again, to infuse new vitality into the earth, even as a loving father suffers hardship and toils to procure sustenance for his family, or as a man dies to enter into a higher state of existence, according to the doctrin of metempsychosis.

The Druidic doctrin taught that all blessings and good were the direct gift of God, and every pain and trial was but an experience necessary as a punishment or atonement to the Evil One. Hence the primary idea of sacrifice in connection with the worship of Hü. But the devil deified was an oriental idea. But the Druidic idea of God was simply the Principle of Good, as represented by peace, love, joy, without hate or malice.

Avagdhu was the Principle of Evil, the Opposer, the Negativ of Good, and all pain and destruction was attributed to him. He was the Great Chemist who destroyed and dissolved everything in annwn (chaos, original elements). Under his hand Hü died figurativly and descended into hell (annwn).

But the Christians hold that it was by a prearranged plan of God—by his express command, and by his chosen priesthood—Jesus was sacrificed as an atonement to himself, and not to the devil. And to giv color to this inconsistency, they invented a myth which they call the righteousness of God, which demands this atonement.

Planetary Development.

BY FRANCIS D. LACY.

Since planets exist for the satisfaction of intellectuality, the inference is that without mind there would need be no such principle as matter. Both, in nature, are absolute necessities, nor will we be partial as to which is the dominant principle, since either alone is a cipher, while both, united, are a universe. It is not our pleasure to investigate this point just here, but will see anon.

Since from nothing nothing arises, while from something something necessitates in the sustenance of a living, acting, and thinking being, the result of the conclusion that either principle originated or controls the other more than by mutual correspondence is fruitless. Either, alone, is a cipher; both, united, are a universe.

The food and atmospheric sustenance of the body retain a realization of its identity within it, and doubtless this natural machinery is equivalent to an electro-magnetic battery, occasioned by the electric currents being conducted by the numerous fibers of the nervous system, ramifying to every part of the body and its extremities, and centering at the medulla, all the principles and forces pervading in the universe, and regarding the present state of the earth's developments, as having evolved from a condition of nebulous or gaseous fluid. When we consider the harmonious order and perfect laws whereby the solar systems hav originated and are kept in balance, the inference is that an unlimited intellectuality has pervaded and is still controling the operations of all nature.

The conditions attending our planet in its formation are equivalent to those attending all others in like stages of development. Our world is a sample planet, from which data we reason, and the elements, species, varieties, principles, temperatures, climates, habits of animals, and even the enterprises of man in this world, are representativ of those in any other at a similar period of its development.

Man, the highest order of animated nature here, is doubtless the highest order in any other world where the conditions of development are adapted for the existence of man and his intellectual excellences depend upon the natural progress of the earth in her development. Doubtless the highest intellectual abilities of man existed nearer the poles or a higher latitude than now; but at the present time, what intellectuality lies between the thirty-seventh and forty-eighth degrees, north and south latitudes, is worth more than five times the human intelligence of all the rest of the world. But ten thousand years hence (not doubting but the earth will stand ten times ten thousand years) the highest intelligence will exist nearer the equator, as by that time the climate at this latitude will be much colder than now.

The rigor of cold climates impedes the progress of enterprise, while the hot climates nurse man in his indolence. "Necessity, the mother of invention," spurs man to enterprise where the conditions best afford the opportunities for him to pursue. More in relation to this portion of my subject anon.

The theory that those planets furthest from the sun are necessarily colder is not at all reasonable. All require the same temperatures in the progress of their developments. The principle caloric is existent in the planet's own body, while the light received and heat absorbed by a heavenly body is as much enhanced by magnitude as detracted by distance, hence the larger planets, in the economy of nature, are furthest from the sun.

The absence of caloric is indicativ of a planet's death. The moon originating at the same period as the earth, and being about forty-nine times smaller, without doubt has developed to her maturity, and is now expiring with old age. The heated volume being less than that of the earth, it required proportionately less time to cool; and now while icebergs surround her surface, her sister, earth, presents an appearance of her most fascinating bloom. The moon is now held subservient to our use, giving light by night, creating various essential effects upon the earth, and acting as a balance-wheel, equalizing the motion of the earth in her diurnal and annual revolutions.

The asteroids, now in formation, indicate a vast quantity of nebulous fluid between Mars and Jupiter which the attractiv force of neither was sufficient to collect. These small planets increase in size by receiving through their attractiv forces the gaseous substance surrounding them. The attractiv force of each will rarefy the condition of the gaseous material surrounding, so that in each succeeding century each will receive proportionately less substance from meteoric showers and gradual accumulation. Some of the asteroids will doubtless eventually collide, owing to the close proximity of their orbits, forming a single planet of respectable dimensions, where now are several of these comparativly small bodies.

As the internal heat subsides fastest where a planet's diurnal motion is least, there is where vegetation first germinates, and there, from the exceeding cold, is where it first ceases to grow. And thus as the internal heat subsides, the surface grows colder, until earth, like the moon, will die. And such, eventually, will be the fate of all the planets in existence, and each in succession will be swallowed in as food for the sun.

Thus the sun is supported, while in exchange he is throwing out over the regions of his dominions the refined and subtil fluid in the way of light for the formation of a new generation of planets. Thus formation, progression, maturity, and destruction by evolution is the grand order of nature.

McKINNON'S STYLOGRAPHIC PEN.—Mr. Bennett, previous to his departure for the other side of the globe, provided himself with one of these excellent pens, to write up a description of what he may see while away. The pens hav been in use in THE TRUTH SEEKER office for a long time, and they hav proved themselvs a valuable article. The prices vary from $4.00 to $6.00. Address the McKinnon Pen Co., Cor. Broadway and John st., this city.

GOLDSMITH'S heart was soft even to weakness. He was so generous that he quite forgot to be just. He forgave injuries so readily that he might be said to invite them. He was so liberal to beggars that he had nothing left for his tailor and his butcher.—Macaulay.

"Crimes of Preachers."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just finished reading "The Crimes of Preachers," by M. E. Billings, and must say I am astonished at the "magnitude of the sins" wrought by these good men. I hav long known that the reverend hypocrits were a sinful set, but I was still inclined to believe that the worst side had been shown up by the enemy and hoped they were better than Infidel statistics had made them appear. But if nine hundred and seventeen detected crimes hav been committed in five years by the most refined and intelligent class of society, in the "great intellectual belt of the nation," and "not one-half of the published accounts" been seen and preserved by the author of the little volume, we must conclude that though "charity covereth a multitude of sins," it is rather misplaced when it is cast as a veil over the "crimes of preachers," who sin with wide-open eyes, caring for nothing but self and selfish pleasure and lustful gratification, and knowing themselvs to be teachers of myths and miracles, and lies and legends. If 35,000 of the educated and intelligent preachers of the most highly cultivated and intellectual classes of society hav committed four hundred and fifty-six crimes against women in a sexual way, is it not proof positiv that their God is a monster of iniquity and lust, and the Bible from which they draw their code of immorality is libidinous, unchaste, and impure! True, as Mr. Billings says, a great many of these reverend scoundrels "know that the creeds they teach are false and they come to look upon all legal and moral restraint as an abridgment of their rights and upon all morality and virtue as a sham," but, after all, it is their Christian training that has made them what they are—vile hypocrits, wicked deceivers, lustful debauchers, and consummate liars, and too often even murderers in every sense of the word, taking first all that made life valuable and precious, and then, to hide the crime, depriving their poor victim of the last remnant of mortality itself. If I were able I would send for $10 worth of these little unique books and mail them to preachers and pious church-members, accompanying each one with a letter asking them to peruse and comment thereupon.

By thus holding up to them nature's own mirror much good might be done, and many might be convinced that the shoe had always been on the wrong foot, that all the opprobrious epithets the pious hav so delighted in bestowing upon unbelievers in Christian myths, Christian morality, Christian purity, and Christian goodness really belonged to the mud-throwers themselvs.

Buy his book, my friends, and send it far and wide. Tear the veil aside and show the vile monster who has so long worn the mantle of hypocritical piety to hide his gross immoralities just as he is.

> "With features horribler than hell e'er traced
> On its own brood; no demon of the waste,
> No churchyard ghoul, caught lingering in the light
> Of his blest sun, e'er blasted human sight
> With lineaments so foul, so fierce as those
> The impostor now in grinning mockery shows."

The veiled prophet of Khorassan is a true type of these lustful impostors who are scattered all over our beautiful land, these slayers of innocence and morality, whose touch is pollution and whose presence is profanity to true purity. Rouse up, ye truth seekers, and pause not till perishes the foul fiend of Christianity and its 70,000 preachers, who hav, as our friend Billings calculates, probably committed in five years 58,688 crimes, and the majority of them crimes against women. Yet every one of these criminals is supposed by Christian believers to be worthy of the highest heaven if they only repent at the eleventh hour and believe in Christ. How long, O Reason, how long shall such false beliefs rule the world? Go ye, my friends, and teach our gospel of real morality, of true science, and a pure humanity to "all the earth." Teach the deluded victims of priests that

> "No bleeding birds nor bleeding beasts,
> No hyssop branch nor sprinkling priests,
> No running brook, nor flood nor sea,
> Can wash man's guilty stains away."
> Can you unwhipped of justice go
> Because some priest has told you so?
> Can you escape the avenging rod
> That follows evil ways you've trod?
> Can you transfer a moral stain?
> Can you transfer the burn and pain?
> Neuralgia's stings can others bear?
> Your hectic flush can others wear?
> Your scrofula, or plague, or stone
> Be fastened on to other bones?
> And you scot-free allowed to go?
> Are there still fools who swear 'tis so?
> Since progress is the sovereign rule,
> To lead from low to higher schools;
> Since justice can't for sins atone,
> Each soul must bear its sins alone.
> Yet all are taught without disguise
> That pardon cometh from the skies;
> That crimes of every name and hue,
> May cheaply be forgiven you.

England's Disgrace.

Not for many years has England been so disgraced as she was by the action of her Parliament last week. As John Bright, the distinguished statesman, says, it was an unprecedented scene. But to a church that has burned and tortured people for religion's sake it will probably be regarded as a not very heinous crime to debar an Atheist from taking his seat in a Parliament to which he has been twice elected, and to which he has every right that England's unwritten constitution and national usage can entitle him. Every lover of liberty in both hemispheres must feel his blood surge hot through his veins as he reads the report of the outrage upon Mr. Bradlaugh, perpetrated by order of the speaker of the House of Commons. The persecution has been watched with no less interest in this country than in Europe, although here the political aspects of the case are less understood, and consequently the religious aspects stand out more prominently. The refusal to allow Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat comes entirely from the religious element, which unfortunately is strong enough to compass its ends. The church of England is a huge state machine foisted upon the people by law and supported by money forcibly taken from the people. In times past it has employed armies to do its bidding. Instead of missionaries it sent generals, and along with the Bible went the sword and musket, the rack and the stake. The nineteenth century is too late for these agents, so it now, through its tool, the speaker of the House, resorts to gag-law and policemen to deprive Liberals of their political rights.

The first obstruction the church places in the way of Infidels who may be elected to Parliament is an iron-clad oath which forces the taker to avow his belief in a God. Mr. Bradlaugh does not believe in this relic of a barbarian superstition, and demanded to be allowed to affirm, which after much parleying was allowed by the government party. Mr. Bradlaugh then assumed his prerogativs, took his seat, and voted. Then a pious M. P. dug up an old law fining a man £500 for every such vote cast, and instituted suit against Mr. Bradlaugh. He gained his point, and the seat was declared vacant. Mr. Bradlaugh returned to his constituents and was again triumphantly elected over his clerical opponent, who entered the canvass as a church man, endeavoring to get to Parliament on his piety alone as a qualification. Mr. Bradlaugh, thinking he could do more good in than out of the house, then announced himself as ready to take the oath, but the privilege was peremptorily denied him. Having waited for Mr. Gladstone to amend the oath, as he promised, Mr. Bradlaugh demanded as his right that he be allowed to assume his seat. He had given full notice to the House, to his constituents, and to the country at large, that he intended to obtain his seat. He had held immense meetings in London, and is supported by thousands of people, but Gladstone, infiuenced by the church, would take no notice of his appeal for his right. And then occurred this scene, in which the great government of England has degraded itself in the eyes of the civilized world, and taken a long step backward toward the middle ages, when might was right, and the church, as the instrument of God, was a tyrannical assassin. We giv the report, as cabled over here, in full:

LONDON, August 3, 1881.

Mr. Bradlaugh attempted to force his way into the House of Commons to-day in fulfilment of the notification previously made. The utmost interest was felt in the result, and fears were entertained lest a strong body of supporters should gain access to the lobby and enable Mr. Bradlaugh to force his way into the body of the House. To obviate this danger orders were issued against the admission to the lobby of the House of any but members of Parliament. The enforcement of this order gave the House a bleak, deserted appearance until half-past eleven o'clock, when the members began to arrive in large numbers.

At a quarter to twelve the sounds of distant cheers made themselvs faintly heard, and murmurs ran through the crowd of assembled members, "He has come." Almost immediately Bradlaugh appeared coming through the entrance reserved for members. He looked pale and evidently suffered from suppressed excitement. His black dress hightened the effect of his pallor. Labouchere welcomed his colleague, and the opportunity for a short delay before the proceedings could begin to hold a consultation about the tactics to be pursued. A rumor ran through the lobby that Bradlaugh meant to use absolute force to obtain entrance and to resist removal. This hightened the interest, and when the speaker passed to prayers carcely an honorable member followed.

The arrangements to prevent Bradlaugh's entrance were most complete. At the door of the House stood two deputy sergeants-at-arms, Erskine and Gosset, Jr., flanked on either side by a number of policemen picked for great bodily strength. A number of athletic Conservativ members also stood close to the door, only too anxious to distinguish themselvs as volunteers in suppressing the Atheist. The defending force looked quite nervous, and closed up their ranks when the speaker passed through. The member for Northampton showed a disposition to break through the ranks with a sudden rush. It was with a feeling of relief that all heard the announcement, "The speaker is in the chair," which told that business had begun and the moment for action had arrived. Involuntarily all eyes were turned toward Bradlaugh, and without a word spoken a lane was opened to let him pass through the crowd which interposed between him and the door of the House.

With steady, resolute stride the member from Northampton made directly for the door, and so eager were the members to hear and see all that should occur that the rush nearly pushed him, with the deputy sergeants-at-arms, into the sacred precincts. Erskine, however, barred the way and informed Bradlaugh that by the speaker's orders he was obliged to forbid him to pass. A short parley ensued in low tones, being quite inaudible owing to the buzz of excited comment. Suddenly Bradlaugh seized Erskine and attempted to push him aside. Immediately the member from Northampton was seized by the other deputy sergeants-at-arms and a number of policemen, who proceeded to drag him across the lobby toward the members' entrance.

He struggled violently and a most painful scene ensued. He was half pulled and half shoved through the door by sheer force, followed by hundreds of members, principally Conservativs. Many of them indulged in unbecoming jibes at the scene which will be remembered with pain and sorrow as long as the history of Parliament is recalled to mind. Down the broad stairway, struggling all the way with might and main, at the risk of breaking his own and his captor s necks, was the member from Northampton dragged until the outer door of the Palace yard was reached. Then the doors were swung to and the expelled member was released from the grip of his assailants. A number of delegates who had obtained admission to the precincts witnessed the conclusion of the disgraceful scene from beyond the lines of policemen, and cries of "Shame, shame!" rent the air as Bradlaugh was hurled out of the door.

These men made a rush to his aid. Umbrellas were brandished, and the angry cries of the spectators in the Palace yard were taken up and echoed by thousands of men, who were shut out from the yard by a strong cordon of policemen. For a moment it seemed as if a physical contest with the police was about to ensue, and had the struggle with Bradlaugh continued the matter would hav probably ended in a riot. When Bradlaugh, who stood in the center of the circle of policemen like a wounded stag at bay, recovered somewhat his breath, he said to inspector Denning that he would return with a force that would compel his admission or his arrest.

Inspector Denning mockingly asked him how many would come with him. Bradlaugh replied, "Something less than a million." Cheer after cheer was given for Bradlaugh by the people, but the police soon cleared the precincts of the House, and Bradlaugh was left standing almost alone in the midst of the policemen. Here he held his post for about half an hour, and then left, heartily cheered by the crowd. The attention of the House was immediately called to the incident by Mr. Labouchere, who submitted a motion of privilege on the ground that the member had been assaulted by order of the speaker, whom he charged with acting beyond his authority. Mr. Gladstone replied, defending the action of the speaker.

After Mr. Broadhurst (advanced Liberal) and Mr. Cowen (radical reformer) had spoken in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh, John Bright described how Mr. Bradlaugh was brought down to the Palace yard in a fainting condition. He thought such a scene was unprecedented. He appealed to the opposition to reconsider their former decision, so as to extricate themselvs from the present difficulties. He was called to order for irrelevancy.

Lord John Manners (Conservativ) said that Mr. Bright's attitude was calculated to encourage Mr. Bradlaugh, who had necessitated his forcible removal by attempting a forcible entry.

An amendment to Mr. Labouchere's motion declaring that the House approves the conduct of the speaker and of the officers under his orders was accepted by Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote, and was passed. A number of Liberal members quitted the House before the vote was taken amid ironical cheers.

Mr. Bradlaugh, after his expulsion, went to Bow street for a summons against the police.

Just before the final act in this painful tragedy the speaker, by whose orders it was done, passed in to prayers, and a chaplain, who draws a large salary for his week's services, prayed to God for the House. It needed it. It needed some appeal to somebody who might possibly hav a sense of decency and right, for the members of the House, with four glorious exceptions, hav none. But little more is needed to place England and her government on a par with Russia. Just such political tyrrany led to the killing of the czar. Just such religious oppression and inhuman treatment of the people as England has been guilty of in her government of Ireland, her treatment of the Irish members of the House of Commons, her suspension of Parnell, led to the French Revolution. It was British tyranny that gave to the world the United States. The Infidel Paine was a leader then; the Atheist Bradlaugh may become the Paine of his century. British liberty has received a terrible blow in this expulsion. It is no wonder that with such a policy in force Ireland is in revolt.

The essence of freedom is that all the people shall hav representation in the common legislature. It is also that the representativ shall from each constituency be a man of the choice of that constituency. And it is as much tyranny for the House of Commons to expel or refuse to admit a worthy man honestly elected solely on account of the opinions, political or religious, that he holds, as it would be tyranny in the Queen if she should attempt by an edict to prevent his election or admission, or compel his expulsion. Mr. Bradlaugh is the duly elected member of Parliament from Northampton. His expulsion, and the subsequent refusal to admit him after reëlection, is a practical denial of representation to Northampton. And that is now the attitude of Parliament toward this constituency. The free right of representation denied, free speech in Parliament choked, men with political opinions obnoxious to the majority expelled, the law twisted and strained to strangle the freedom of the press to incarcerate an editor for the publication of his opinions in matters of public moment, and an English constituency warned that they shall hav no representativ if they send to Parliament a man who really represents their political views, England stands to-day the leader among constitutional governments in narrowing the limits of political liberty.

Mr. Gladstone will suffer more from this usurpation of power than Mr. Bradlaugh. The latter can bide his time. Liberty is coming. Freedom will not always be choked by priestly hands. Universal liberty may not be here or in England in this year or next year, and probably never anywhere till the church is forced to relax her hold upon the people, but the time is coming. Two hundred years ago Bradlaugh would hav been burned. That the church cannot do it now shows progress, however slow. But Gladstone, for the part he has played, will be execrated by all Liberal people. His boasted Christianity is but the garb of the hypocrit. That he did not seize the opportunity to show broad statesmanship shows his much-vaunted genius to be a sham—brilliant, but of no depth. The persecution is honorable to none but the Infidel, and is outrageously disgraceful to all the Christians engaged in it.

Crowing too Soon.

The Baptist Messenger exultingly prints this:

For several years Col. Ingersoll has appeared in the role of a blatant, bold blasphemer of God's holy word, and has defiantly challenged open discussion with those who believe the Bible to be divinely inspired.

The challenge was accepted by Allen B. Magruder, a lawyer and lecturer of Stephens, Virginia (formerly of Baltimore, Maryland), who is well known as a man of eminent talent and education, and is every way well qualified to meet the retreating Colonel.

The acceptance of Ingersoll's challenge was published in the Restitution, a weekly paper printed at Plymouth, Indiana, a copy of which was mailed to Mr. Ingersoll; a registered communication was also sent, for which Mr. Magruder has the Colonel's receipt.

The result is, the challenging Infidel makes no response, but retreats in silence.

The Christian Chiliart, published at Wilmington, Delaware, commenting on the above challenge, says: "It should be a cause of humiliation to the rank and file of Infidelity that their most eloquent and presumptuous champion has beat an ignoble retreat from his accepted challenge. . . . Over two months hav elapsed since Ingersoll was notified by the man worthy of his steel, yet no response has the bold champion of Infidelity returned. We would modestly suggest to THE TRUTH SEEKER that it coax the Goliath from his cowardly retreat, or expose to contempt the effrontery of a colleague who challenges only as a braggadocio."

If Col. Ingersoll should stop to chastise every cur that barks at his heels he would do little else. Scores of small-fry ministers and lawyers hav challenged the Colonel to debate because they wanted the notoriety such an encounter would giv them, and would be satisfied to get soundly whipped, although it is doubtful if they could get through their thick heads the fact that they were whipped. They don't represent anything but themselvs, no two agreeing in their notions, and they can find no church willing to risk its reputation on their efforts. Col. Ingersoll met and vanquished Judge Jeremiah Black—or rather Judge Black made an unsuccessful attempt to meet the Colonel; and we hav no doubt but that if the Christian churches of the country will get together and put some person forward who will represent the united force and best talent of Christendom, Mr. Ingersoll will debate with him, and we hav no more doubt but that he will giv a good account of himself. As for expecting the Colonel will meet every six-by-nine Christian who can scrape together money enough to hire his challenged published in some obscure Christian paper, the idea is ridiculous. The Christians might as well expect their devil to personally chastise every deacon who takes his name in vain.

MR. CHAINEY has put T. B. Wakeman's lecture—delivered in Paine Hall, Boston, on "The Age of Revision"—into the Infidel Pulpit. It is in Mr. Wakeman's best vein, and lays down some truths which all Liberals should know. He says there never was such a man as Christ on earth, never an authentic text of the gospels, and never a genuin text, and supports his statements in an unanswerable manner. He would revise the whole system of theology; and, in the light of his method of revision, we shall hav, instead of an anthropomorphic God, the Infinit; instead of a personal Christ, Humanity; instead of a Holy Ghost, Love, Charity; instead of the Virgin, Woman and Womanhood; instead of a mythical heaven, the new heaven within us and on earth; instead of a mythical hell in the center of the earth, the hells of remorse and evils on earth; and instead of dogmatic creeds he would hav science and her methods.

Mr. Wakeman's revision of theology into a revised Positivism is very instructiv and pleasant reading; and all who want a sensible lecture setting forth a sensible religion can get it by sending to this office, inclosing five cents.

What We Want to Do.

Mr. Bennett has undertaken, at the request of his hundreds of friends, a very arduous journey, involving an immense amount of labor. He has left his beloved paper in the hands of his friends to sustain, trusting in their interest in the great cause of Liberalism to keep it from harm. We do not want him to be disappointed. We want all our friends to help us to double the circulation and therewith its influence and power for doing good. During the years since it started its undaunted editor has made many sacrifices for Liberalism. And now that his friends hav sent him off on a year's journey we hav no hesitation in asking them to do a little to sustain the paper from which they hav taken its heroic editor. We conceive that the letters he will write from abroad will be an unfailing source of instruction and delight, and we want them scattered all over the country. Let our friends ask their friends to subscribe for the year in which they will appear weekly. We know they will be pleased with them, and we think that after they hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year they will not want to giv it up. And we do not want the friends to think that because Mr. Bennett has gone around the world the paper will not want any money. It does. If every subscriber will promptly pay all will go well. If not, not. The thing we do not want to do is to hav to send out notices to delinquents.

The many "V's" which appear in our round-the-world list hav been taken by Mr. Bennett to pay expenses of the trip, and we must hav the regular amount to run the paper. All who hav been instrumental in sending him away ought to take an unusual interest in making his place good. Many expressed fears that with the editor away the paper would decline. We do not think so, and, if all will help, we know it will not. It would be a pleasant thing for the friends to do to present to the voyager they hav sent away a doubled-up subscription list when he returns. We will do our part in the office if our friends will do theirs all over the country.

WE hav letters here for A. Sherman, Mrs. Frances, Mrs. Clarkson, "Liberty," and M. le de Barkany, which we will forward on receiving the proper address and stamps to cover postage.

DON'T forget to send for THE TRUTH SEEKER poster. It will be a great aid in procuring subscriptions. Many Spiritualistic camp-meetings and Liberal gatherings are now being held, and if friends who propose attending would take along some of these and post them up they could do great good. We will mail them upon application.

W. F. JAMIESON lectured in Centerville, Mich., twice July 31st, and addressed the colored people Emancipation day (Aug. 2d) in South Haven, Mich. He is now in northern Michigan. Address him at Albion, Mich.

THE Third Annual Convention of the Union Reform League meets in the Town Hall, Princeton, Mass., Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, Aug. 28th, 29th, and 30th. Three sessions daily. Stephen Pearl Andrews, Juliet H. Severance, Colonel J. H. Blood, L. K. Joslin, A. K. Wood, Angela T. Heywood, Lyman A. Wiley, A. D. Wheeler, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likeness of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will he sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine $1.

The Hornellsville Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just received the following letter from Dr. T. L. Brown, President of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. Will you please giv it a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER? H. L. G.

MR. H. L. GREEN, My Dear Secretary: The Annual Address I am to giv the Freethinkers' Convention at Hornellsville on the thirty-first of August will be on "The Science and Art of Health, in its Relations to Right Living."

In this address no Christian, Spiritualist, or non-sectarian will hear a word in defense of any sect, party, or ism connected with politics, medicin, or religion.

My desire is to giv demonstrated knowledge of things understandable and indispensable to health and happiness.

By analysis, reason, logic, and argument I shall support the known laws of science and art needed in living a true and useful life, enjoying liberty of thought and speech.

I shall endeavor to be practical, and therefore available.

The only fair way to eradicate ignorance or error is to put in its place the thinkable, the known, the understandable, and the serviceable.

To this end I labor for the good of the Association.

Ever truly yours, T. L. BROWN.

Binghamton, N. Y., Aug. 1, 1881.

Around the World.

On another page is the round-the-world list. Several names hav been added since last printed, and we would like to add many more. The volumes of the travel Mr. Bennett will write will be dedicated to those who furnish the funds. The names will be printed in the first volume, and there is yet plenty of time to swell the list. The illustration will cost considerable extra, and a thousand "V's" will be none too many to pay the expenses of the trip and the printing and illustrating of the volumes. The books are open, and we shall add names with thankful pleasure.

IN another column appears an advertisment of Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker's new fortnightly journal, Liberty. Of the first number Mr. James Parton says in a letter to the editor, "Yours is the best first number that I hav ever seen."

MRS. A. H. COLBY and Mrs. O. K. Smith are engaged to attend the yearly meeting at McLean, N. Y., Aug. 7th; at North Lansing, Aug. 14th. Mrs. Colby spoke at Neshaminy Falls, July 29th, 31st, and Aug. 2d. They are engaged for the month of September by the First Society of Spiritualists of Philadelphia. Parties in that vicinity wishing their services for funerals or week-evening lectures may address Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, 1208 Mount Vernon street, Philadelphia, Pa. Permanent address, Laona, N. Y.

A Letter of Thanks from Miss Wixon.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Friend: Many thanks for that excellent lithograph likeness. It is a pleasant reminder of one who has ever bravely toiled for the uplifting of humanity, and who never in any hour of danger or defeat shirked his duty, but always pressed straight on toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of truth.

Every Liberal should possess a copy of this picture of one who has started out truth-seeking, for it represents a brave and fearless searcher, and should he never return from his long trip around the world it will be a precious memento to those he leaves behind. But he will return, laden with much precious and valuable information; and all who read the "Truth Seeker in Europe" will anticipate a great deal of pleasure in reading the volumes promised for this long voyage. I expect to read the best and most authentic history of the world ever written, in Bennett's promised book.

With many wishes for a safe and prosperous journey and a happy return home, I remain, as ever,

Yours for truth, SUSAN H. WIXON.

Fall River, Mass., Aug. 8, 1881.

For the Illustrations.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I very much appreciate and would encourage the suggestion of Elmina to contribute liberally toward illustrations in Bennett's around-the-world volumes.

Copious illustrations, such as are true to nature and art, greatly add to the value of a book, especially so from that part of the world whence we hav so little that is reliable; but instead we hav forlorn fancy sketches, such as Samson's dental operation on a lion, Jonah launching a whale, Captain Noah's transport ship, President Moses canaling the Red Sea, the prophet's flying machine, etc.

I trust the suggestion will find material aid sufficient to warrant a very interesting book or books in this particular.

I am reminded of what I wrote Bennett when in prison: "Your thirteen months imprisonment will do more for the cause you advocate than as many years would hav done without it."

Persecution is a good advertisment. Your subscribers and sympathizing friends are greatly increased. We hav the "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "An Infidel Abroad," an exceedingly interesting volume, with a prospect of two or more equally interesting volumes, "Around the World," all of which are due to persecution.

What a boon Comstock has unwittingly bestowed upon Bennett and the Liberal-minded!

Ayer, Mass., Aug. 8, 1881. ELIJAH MYRICK.

IF misery loves company, the Rev. Congressman J. Hyatt Smith's Brooklyn congregation in Lee avenue will not groan over the condition of affairs in the Bedford Avenue Reformed church of Brooklyn. Like the Lee Avenue Baptist church, it is in financial straits, and unless the brethren put their hands deep in their pockets the Reformed church will follow in the footsteps of the Baptist and go under the hammer. It will require $47,000 to ward off the impending shock—considerable money in these days. The members of the church congratulate themselvs that their case is not quite as hard as that of their Baptist brethren, who stand in fear of seeing their old sanctuary sold for a theater. The Reformed brethren know that if they fail in raising the $47,000 their sanctuary will suffer no worse fate than to become the property of the Universalist Church of Our Father.

The Hornellsville Convention.

From every quarter I am receiving the most encouraging news as to the prospects of the Hornellsville Convention. There will be large and respectable delegations present from nearly all the New England states, from the Middle and northwestern states, and from Canada, and a few from the Southern states. Nearly all the live Freethinkers from western and central New York will be present, and many from western Pennsylvania. The following persons are getting up parties in their respectiv neighborhoods to attend the Convention, viz: Joseph York, Meadville, Pa.; Geo. W. Baldwin, Linesville, Pa.; Clement W. Austen, Rochester, N. Y.; N. G. Upson, Nunda Station, N. Y.; David Cosad, Jr., Oak's Corners, N. Y.; S. S. Ball, Penn Yan, N. Y.; William Bonnell, Waterloo, N. Y.; Samuel Cosad, Wolcott, N. Y.; W. F. Graves, Castile, N. Y.; D. B. Morton, Groton, N. Y.; J. P. Armstrong, Ogdensburg, N. Y.; Henry Reynolds, Albion, N. Y.; E. D. Van Slyke, Hamilton, N. Y.; Wm. Estus, Cape Vincent, N. Y.; Wm. D. Hunt, New York; G. W. Bayes, Little Valley, N. Y.; J. B. Gray, Perrysburg, N. Y.; R. W. Moss. Gowanda, N. Y.; J. A. Kennicott, New Albion, N. Y.; George Smith, Buffalo, N. Y.; J. B. Washburn, Attica, N. Y.; B. V. Kidd, Burns, N. Y.; J. L. Walker, Canaseraga, N. Y.; J. A. Gould, Hinsdale, N. Y.; Hiram Wheaton, Allegany, N. Y.; George Colwell, Forestville, N. Y.; H. Harty, Elmira, N. Y.; John W. Truesdell, Syracuse, N. Y.; H. B. McNair, Dansville, N. Y.; O. S. Chase, Jamestown, N. Y.; Wm. R. Mills, Hume, N. Y.; W. H. Jones, Clayville, N. Y.; J. T. Crosby, Belvidere, N. Y.; H. L. Doty, Ettenville, N. Y.; Reuben Halsted, West Walworth, N. Y.; J. W. Sterns, Custer City, Pa.; R. C. Trowbridge, Tully, N. Y.; Dr. A. Robinson, McLean, N. Y.; C. H. Latham, Randolph, N. Y.; W. J. Tillotson, Oneida, N. Y.; A. P. Bradt, North Hannibal, N. Y.; S. Hoagg, New York Mills, N. Y.; Charles C. Chase. Marengo, N. Y.; J. M. Harwood, Hess Road, N. Y.; C. D. King, Geneva, N. Y.; J. T. Reynolds, Gouverneur, N. Y.; Lawrence Fay, Gloversville, N. Y.; J. Fritz, Macedon, N. Y.; Luther Myres, Ludlowville, N. Y.; J. H. Northrup, Freedman, N. Y.; L. N. Stephens, Cuba, N. Y.; David Madison, Dayton, N. Y.; A. Andrews, Cattaraugus, N. Y.; M. B. Fobes, Olean, N. Y.; James H. Hadison, Bradford, Pa.; S. E. Latta, Friendship, N. Y.; John Lelons, Belmont, N. Y.; William H. Wyman, Dunkirk, N. Y.; W. J. Whitewood, Wellsville, N. Y.; A. B. Stebbins, Canisteo, N. Y.; Harrison Westlake, Addison, N.Y.; B. C. Wood, Painted Post; E. Pier, Corning, N. Y.; N. Morse, Owego, N. Y.; S. A. Talmadge, Horseheads, N. Y.; Dr. B. W. Franklin, Ithaca, N. Y., and many more in various parts of the state.

The speakers who hav indicated that they would be present are Hon. Elizur Wright, Horace Seaver, George Chainey, W. S. Bell, T. B. Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, A. L. Rawson, Samuel P. Putnam, J. H. Burnham, J. S. Verity, C. Fanny Allyn, Miss Ella Gibson, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Reuben Daily, Lyman C. Howe, Hon. R. S. McCormick, Rev. J. H. Harter, O. H. P. Kinney, O. P. Kellogg, and others. I expect to be able to announce definitely, soon, that in the words of Henry Ward Beecher, "the greatest living orator on the face of the globe who speaks the English language" will surely address the great gathering at Hornellsville. All will know whom I mean without my naming Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

There will be ample accommodations at Hornellsville for all who may attend. There are five hotels and many boarding-houses, and hundreds of private houses are arranging to keep boarders. The hotels hav agreed to keep the people for one dollar per day, and good board can be had at the private houses and boarding-houses for from fifty to seventy-five cents per day. Dr. Shuttuck has refitted up his Opera House in fine style and contributes the use of it to the Convention free. Friends, all is now ready for the great feast of reason and eloquence, and every lover of universal mental liberty should try and be present at the Freethinkers' Convention.

If you hav not already caused a notice to be published in your local journals, copy the following and request your local editor to publish it.

H. L. GREEN, Sec.

FREETHINKERS' NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The New York State Freethinkers' Association has called its Fourth Annual Convention to meet in Hornellsville, N. Y., the 31st of the present month, to continue in session five days. The committee having the matter in charge has invited, as heretofore, the Freethinkers of the various states of the Union to meet with the Association in general convention, and the prospects are that most of the states and Canada will be represented at Hornellsville. Some twenty-five of the ablest Freethought lecturers of this country hav been engaged to speak, among whom are many persons of national reputation.

The hotels hav agreed to entertain those who attend for one dollar per day, and the boarding-houses for a less sum. The sessions of the Convention will be held in Dr. Shattuck's Opera House, that has just been refitted in fine style. Near the Opera House is a fine grove, in which outdoor meetings can be held if required. The Erie railroad has agreed to return all who attend over that road, or any of its branches, at one-third the usual rate of fare, and the Utica and Elmir road will do the same.

Selections.

[From Parton's Life of Voltaire.]

To the Pantheon.

For thirteen years the body of Voltaire remained in the vault of the village church in Champagne. All had then changed in France, or was swiftly changing. The Revolution was in full tide. June 1, 1791, the king of France, the same ill-starred Louis XVI., but then a king only in name, signed a decree of the National Assembly, which ordered that "the ashes of François-Marie Arouet de Voltaire be transferred from the church of Romilli to that of Sainte-Geneviève in Paris," the church that was to be styled thenceforth the Pantheon of France. It was at first intended to deposit the body in the Pantheon on the 4th of July following, a day as dear then to France as to America; but the intervening time was found too short, and the crowning ceremonial was of necessity postponed until July 10th.

The body was solemnly removed from the place where it had rested, and was placed upon an open funereal car, twenty feet high, adorned with oak leaves and laurel; and it began its long journey under the escort of the local officers and a detachment of the national guard of the province. As the cortége advanced from village to village, and from town to town, it was joined temporarily by the mayors and their associate functionaries, as well as by files of citizen-soldiers, carrying at the ends of their muskets leaves of oak and branches of laurel. The procession, which changed every moment, passed through lines of spectators, who threw flowers upon the sarcophagus and saluted it by presenting crowns. The villagers and peasants were then rejoicing in their first freedom from those feudal burdens, those complex vexations, which Voltaire had undermined by satire and argument, and they seemed to feel that it was to him they owed their deliverance. The people of rural France were enjoying, for the moment, some of the substantial fruits of reasonable liberty, and no one yet foresaw the price they were to pay for it—they, and their children, and their children's children. Aged peasants were seen to shed tears of grateful homage, and mothers of families lifted their little children above the heads of the crowd, that they, too, might see. Some persons brought out precious objects from their houses, which they made more precious by causing them to touch the sarcophagus. Some priests, too, restored to manhood by the Revolution, were observed to sympathize with and share the popular emotion.

During the night the procession still held on its way, welcomed in every village by torches and lanterns, so that the road by which it was to pass seemed all lighted up in advance. In the daytime the towns disclosed triumphal arches, hung with garlands of flowers; and, with that classic taste that seems indigenous to France alone, dancers arranged themselvs spontaneously about the car, and young girls, clad in white, threw upon it jessamin, violets, and roses. At that time of year, it was said, nature herself had lavished upon the earth the three beautiful colors by which recreated France had symbolized the union of the three orders of the people.

The car itself was a beautiful object. The great structure was drawn by four horses caparisoned in violet, and covered with flowers. At each corner of the lofty platform was a pilaster of white marble, from which elegant hangings were suspended, and which sustained a canopy all fluttering with the three national colors. The sarcophagus was so placed that it appeared to be suspended from garlands of flowers; and round the outside of the car a gallery was constructed, from which seemed to grow poplars and cypress-trees. On the front of the car was written, "To the manes of Voltaire;" along one side, "If man is created free, he ought to govern himself;" upon the other, "If man has tyrants, he ought to dethrone them."

When the procession reached the gates of the capital, it was met by a numerous deputation of municipal officers, headed by the mayor; also by delegations from the principal patriotic clubs and literary societies. It was nearly dark when the cortége entered Paris, and it marched that night only as far as the site of the Bastille, not yet wholly removed. There, upon the very spot where the tower had stood in which Voltaire had twice been confined, the architect Cellerier had constructed an altar out of the stones of the fallen edifice, covered with laurels and roses. Upon this the sarcophagus was placed. On the side of the altar was the inscription, "Upon this spot where despotism chained thee, Voltaire, receive the homage of a free people!"

"All Paris," says M. Dubois, the historian of these events, "went as if upon pilgrimage to pay their tributes of love and respect to him who, conveyed clandestinly from Paris in 1778, reëntered it after thirteen years of exile, avenged, adored, and triumphant." In the midst of the general acclamations, one cry not in harmony with the rest was heard: "God, thou shalt be avenged!" It was the voice, says the same writer, of "a fanatic priest, who, full of the souvenirs of 1572, had edged his way into the crowd, as formerly, in glorious Rome, some drunken porters mingled insults with the acclamations of triumph."

All night the sarcophagus remained among the ruins of the Bastille. On Monday morning, clouds veiled the rising sun; it rained several times; but before noon the clouds broke away, the sun shone out warm and clear, making a beautiful afternoon for the procession through the city. Toward three o'clock, all being in readiness, the sarcophagus was placed upon the new car designed by David, and the cortége began to move toward the Pantheon. First marched a detachment of cavalry, a body of sappers, drummers, artillerymen, and some of the young National Guard. A group of citizens from distant places followed, carrying medallions of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Franklin, with the bust of Mirabeau in the center, then only a few months dead. The workmen employed in demolishing the Bastille marched next, their chief, Talloy, carrying chains, bullets, armor, and other objects found in the Bastille. Another body of workmen bore the flag of the Bastille, and among them was seen the giantess who had made herself conspicuous in the attack on the building. Behind them marched citizens armed with pikes, surrounding one who carried upon the top of his pike a red cap. A model of the Bastille made of its own stone, one of the eighty models designed for the departments of France, was carried in the procession by the Old French Guard, wearing the uniform in which they had refused to fire upon their countrymen. The Jacobin Club was conspicuous, and the Hundred Swiss, and bodies of the National Guard. The academies, the actors, the society of artists, and indeed almost every organized body in the metropolis took part in the procession, or contributed a delegation to it.

Among the maxims and devices exhibited, the following were remarked, all taken from Voltaire's writings:

"I hav done a little good; it is my best work."

"They hav troubled the earth, and I hav consoled it."

"If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him."

A striking object in the procession was the statue of Voltaire, modeled upon that of Houdon, gilt, crowned with laurels, carried by men dressed in Greek costume, and surrounded by pupils of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, all dressed in the Greek manner.

The great car that bore the sarcophagus, a stupendous object indeed, announced itself from a long distance. It was preceded by a chorus of singers and a band of music, also clad in the Greek fashion, many carrying instruments of music of antique pattern. The car itself was the crowning marvel of the occasion. It was a vehicle of vast size and hight, supported on four great wheels of bronze, and adorned in every part by allegorical figures and decorations from the designs of David. It presented the general appearance of a magnificent altar, covered with blue velvet sown with stars of gold, upon the summit of which was the sarcophagus, and upon that a full-length figure of Voltaire, half reclining, in an attitude of sleep, and covered with a purple cloth. Immortality, represented as a young girl, winged, and as if just descending from heaven, was placing upon his head a crown of stars. This imposing structure, "forty feet high," was drawn by twelve white horses, harnessed four abreast, led by grooms dressed in the manner of ancient Rome.

The passing of this wonderful vehicle, preceded by its band of music and its chorus of singers, by ranks of men also in long white tunics and wearing crowns of green branches, kindled all the enthusiasm of the susceptible Parisians. Upon the car were various inscriptions, the reading of which increased and prolonged the emotion of the people:

"Mortals are equal; it is not birth, it is virtue alone, which makes the difference."

"It is necessary to love the laws; it is necessary to be their slave, and to bear all the burden of them. He who is willing to violate them does not love his country."

"He defended Calas, La Barre, Sirven, and Montbailly."

"Poet, philosopher, historian, he gave a great impulse to the human mind, and prepared us to become free."

"He combated the Atheists and the fanatics."

"He inspired toleration."

"He claimed the rights of man against serfdom and feudalism."

Immediately behind the car walked Belle-et-Bonne and her husband, with her infant daughter carried by its nurse. La Harpe also walked with this group. Then came deputations from the National Assembly, the municipality, the courts of justice, and the veteran soldiers, the procession being closed by another body of cavalry. A hundred thousand persons, it is said, composed this procession, which was witnessed by six hundred thousand spectators. "It seemed," says Dubois, "that that worship of human excellence, elegant and poetic, which made the delight of antiquity, and which is still the charm of souls susceptible to the beautiful creations of the arts and letters, lived again in its completeness before our eyes."

The procession halted first before the Opera House, adorned with the bust of Voltaire, and with medallions bearing the names of his operas. Here all the artists of the company joined in singing that spirited song of his at the end of the first act of "Samson," which the Revolution adopted as its own, beginning,

"Peuple, eveille-toi! Romps tes fers!"

Thousands of voices joined in the chorus, which had already become familiar to the people. The next halt was in front of the house of the Villettes, upon the street which had been the Quai of the Monks, but which had now received the name it still bears, "Quai de Voltaire." The car here passed under a magnificent triumphal arch composed of four large poplar-trees united by garlands of oak leaves, a beautiful umbrageous roof, from which hung a crown of roses that descended upon the car as soon as it stopped. Upon a spacious platform in front of the house were seated in semicircles, one above the other, fifty young girls, all dressed in white robes with blue girdles, holding civic crowns, and wearing upon their heads diadems of roses. In front of the exquisit amphitheater formed by them were the two daughters of Calas, in deep mourning, who, when the car stopped, advanced toward it, kissed the sarcophagus of their deliverer, and lifted up their hands in the attitude of blessing him. Madame de Villette also stepped forward, kissed the effigy, and raised her child in her arms, as if dedicating it to his spirit. This scene passed to the sound of pathetic music; and the young mother, overcome by her emotions, had to be carried away.

A halt was made, of course, at the Théâter-Français, which was now called the "Theater of the Nation." Here the decorations and the ceremonial were not less remarkable. All the columns were wreathed with garlands and the whole edifice was brilliant. One inscription read, "He wrote 'Œdipe' at seventeen." Another was, "He wrote 'Irene' at eighty-three." Thirty-two medallions were placed upon the pillars, each containing the name of one of Voltaire's dramas. When the car stopped before the theater, curtains opened, and exhibited a sanctuary, so lighted that all the rays formed a halo around the head of Voltaire's statue. Here, while the musicians again performed the chorus from "Samson," La Rive placed upon the sarcophagus a crown, and the ladies of the company also laid their wreaths upon it.

It was now late in the evening, and it began to rain again with such abundance that a part of the persons accompanying the car sought refuge in the vestibule of the theater, and there was a general flight of the ladies. Then, lighted by thousands of torches, the procession resumed its march, and reached the Pantheon at ten o'clock in the evening. The sarcophagus was deposited in the place prepared for it, near the tombs of Descartes and Mirabeau.

And there the body remained, an object of veneration to many, an object of horror to many, until the return of the Bourbon king to Paris, after the departure of Bonaparte to Elba. In April, 1814, a few of the royalists, one of whom was De Puymorin, the Director of the Mint, who afterward told the story, represented to the ministry that the presence of the remains of Voltaire in the ancient church of Sainte-Geneviève was an outrage not to be borne. There were several conferences, we are told, as to the manner in which those remains should be removed. It was decided, at length, that it should be done secretly, and that the secret should be kept. One night, in the month of May, 1814, the bones of Voltaire and of Rousseau were taken out of their coffins of lead, tumbled into a common sack, and placed in a hackney coach stationed in the rear of the church. The carriage moved away slowly, accompanied by five or six persons, and went out of town by unfrequented streets to the barrier De la Gare, opposite Bercy. Near that barrier there was an extensiv piece of waste ground inclosed with a board fence, public property, not yet put to any use whatever. Near the middle of the inclosure a deep hole had been previously dug by persons who were then waiting for the arrival of this strange burial party. The sack of bones was emptied into the pit; a sack of lime was poured upon them. The hole was filled up with earth, all traces were obliterated as far as possible, and the party then separated in silence.

The secret was well kept. There was occasionally a rumor, difficult to trace, and not generally believed, that the sarcophagus was empty. In 1864, when the family of the Villettes became extinct, the heart of Voltaire (which had been removed from the body when it was embalmed, in 1778, inclosed in a silver vase and given by Madame Denis to the husband of Belle-et-Bonne) became the property of the nation, and it was a question with the usurper what should be done with it. He suggested that it be placed with the other remains of the poet in the church of Sainte-Geneviève. The archbishop of Paris, who was probably acquainted with these facts, observed that it might be well to ascertain first whether the ashes of Voltaire were really in the place where they had been deposited. An examination of the sarcophagus was ordered. It was opened, and found to be empty. Thus the fate actually befell the remains which the poet had dreaded from the time when he saw the body of Adrienne Lecouvreur carried out, at dead of night, and placed in an unmarked grave in a vacant lot of the outskirts of Paris. "God, thou shalt be avenged!"

[From Truth.]

An "Old Infidel" Off for Europe.

D. M. Bennett, the veteran Infidel publisher and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose unjust imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary in consequence of Anthony Comstock's machinations is a matter of history, was last Sunday evening the object of a grand ovation on the part of a large number of friends at Daniel E. Ryan's parlors, No. 231 West 37th street. Last year, as duly published in Truth, D. M. Bennett was sent by the American Liberal League to represent this country at the Brussels Congress of Freethought. On that occasion he wrote a little volume entitled "An Infidel Abroad," which found such a large and ready sale here that many prominent Freethinkers in the United States hav lately subscribed to afford Mr. Bennett the opportunity of making a tour around the world. He is to write a series of letters, describing his impressions abroad, which will first appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER and afterward in book form. This project naturally formed the subject of most of Sunday night's congratulatory speeches, although some of the eminent gentlemen present also spoke feelingly of Mr. Bennett's sufferings in the cause of human liberty and Freethought. Several original poems were read, those by S. P. Putnam and Henry A. Stone being particularly happy and appropriate. Madame Ivan C. Michels, the actress, gave a recitation, and several ladies sang operatic selections. Among the persons present were Dr. E. B. Foote and son, both of whom hav suffered at Comstock's hands, Dr. Joseph R. Buchanan, Dr. S. M. Percy, Dr. L. D. Broughton and wife, W. H. Peck, Alexander Warner, T. F. Leslie, and Charles L. Andrews. The proceedings closed with a choice collation.

Mr. Bennett, when seen by Truth yesterday, dwelt at length on his proposed voyage. He intends first visiting England, Scotland, and Ireland, and from there proceeding to the continent, after which he will "tackle" Asia Minor and the holy land. He will go up the Nile as far as the first cataract and travel through all the Asiatic countries excepting Siberia. He expects to start next Saturday, and to be back in New York within a year. Upon his return he will lecture on his experiences abroad, illustrating his lectures with stereoptic views taken by himself. Mr. Bennett's traveling companion is Mr. DeWitt Clinton Bridges, of Indiana.

Before letting the reporter go Mr. Bennett said: "I should feel obliged to you were you to state that I am able to prove the falsity of all the charges that Anthony Comstock has brought against me in a sort of pamphlet he recently published. To giv you an example: in 1877 I issued a circular requesting a number of gentlemen to sign a petition for the repeal of the so-called Comstock postal laws. This circular contained about twelve names of persons whom I knew were in favor of a repeal, as they had so expressed themselvs. Owing to this I did not get them to put their signatures to the paper, but after printing their names to the proof-sheet I went to the persons, and showing it, asked their permission to use the names. In one or two cases consent was not given. I struck the names off. Some few I left, with the understanding that I should hear from them if they had any objections, and hearing none, and knowing their sentiments, I kept their names on. Well, although I acted in thorough good faith throughout, hardly had this circular seen light before Comstock visited these persons, and so browbeat them that seven out of the dozen were actually induced to sign a paper certifying that their names had been used without their authority. Upon the strength of these disavowals Comstock charges me with forgery, and heaps every invectiv upon my head. Now, what does all this amount to? I hav written statements and affidavits of these seven parties in my possession, showing that the disavowals were Comstock's own work, extorted by him, and that the original use of the names was justifiable. In short, to use my friend T. B. Wakeman's words, the blunder was mine, but the crime was Comstock's. His other charges against my morality and integrity are about on a par with the accusation I hav just disposed of."

The Evolution of Soul.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see that some writers for your paper hav taken great pains to prove that mind is the effect of organization of matter, and so come to the conclusion that such mind cannot survive the body's death. T. B. Wakeman, in "Constructiv Liberalism," shows that the soul is evolved from the lowest forms of protoplasm, therefore soul cannot exist separate from protoplasm.

Well, now, does any one doubt that the baby is evolved from the material and forces of the father and mother? Yet who will draw the conclusion that the child cannot exist separated from its parents?

That mind is an effect of organization, I verily believe. That man's soul is evolved from the forces of nature acting upon the lowest forms of protoplasm, I hav no doubt; but whence comes the conclusion that it must die with the body? Cannot the effect outliv the cause? Must the cast-iron lose its shape when its sandy mold is destroyed? May not the spirit be of ethereal and invisible matter, and continue to exist when its grosser prototype, the body, turns back to dust?

Again, mind is an effect of organization. The solar system is organized, and no doubt the whole universe is one grand organism. Should we not believe that it has a soul and thinks as well as you or I? Perhaps a great deal better. And is not that mind shown as plainly in constant law and evolution as it would be in miracles and instant creations?

J. G. TRUMAN.

Is Mind Material?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If it is true, as was stated in my last communication on this subject, published in your issue of April 30th, that there is a supreme, intelligent, self-existent, eternal cause of all things; that the universe is only a medium through which that intelligence manifests its existence and powers, as all created beings like ourselvs and every other kind of living beings in the universe manifest their existence through the material organisms peculiar to themselvs, then I think we hav come fairly and squarely to the proposition that force is not an inherent property of matter, but, on the contrary, we can rest upon the good old idea that matter is inert, and that its inherent property is to keep quiet and lie still until it is acted upon by some power independent of and superior to itself, and that it is entirely unnecessary to bring in the proposition that force is an inherent property of matter to supply the place of God, and account for all the life and intelligence manifested in and through those material organizations.

Let the Almighty reign and rule on the throne of the universe, and in every living intelligence, and in every material organization; from the highest to the lowest within its unbounded realm giv evidence of his eternal existence and power, and in the endless and infinit variety manifested in the works of nature show his all-sufficiency and the infinity of his resources and capacity to meet all circumstances and contingencies, as we may call them, which are, in fact, no more circumstances and contingencies with the great eternal than anything else but a part and parcel of his own creation, and designed to be as they are. And so in everything of which we can hav an idea in the whole universal exhibition which the Almighty has made of himself in the material universe, we see an expression of his ideas, of what he had taught, of what he is thinking, that he has in that creation worked out his ideas, given a tangible expression of his thoughts, and in this light we see God everywhere, ever-present in every part of the universe. Omnipresent, and being self-existent and eternal, he must be omniscient, for, being the author of all things, nothing could be done but what he designed should be done, and he must know as well what it would be before as after it was done; and if anything could happen in the universe of which he was ignorant, then he would not be infinit in knowledge. The thing must be done independent of him, and he would not be all-sufficient; would not be God alone; there would be an opposition god, and then there might be contingencies with him, and contingencies might arise for which he would not be prepared, in consequence of his ignorance, and the whole universe might be imperiled, and all go to wreck and ruin under such an administration as that.

The idea that the Almighty should not be omniscient is as inconsistent with his existence as the denial of any other power or attribute. The Almighty must be the all-in-all or nothing. Now with such an eternal, self-existent, almighty, intelligent power at the helm of the universe, we hav an all-sufficient cause for all that exists. And how it can be that such a being can exist is just as easily explained as how matter came to be in existence without any cause outside of itself, or how such a being could create matter out of nothing as that matter could create itself or exist without creation; or how this being can create worlds, a universe of worlds and living intelligences, and control them as he does, as how I can control my own actions—how, by the exercise of my mind, I can write as I am now doing. I can see that I am writing, I know that my mind is the power that does the work, the thinking, and that controls my hand in the mechanical operation of writing, but I cannot expiain to you the connection between my mind and the operation, or how my mind moves my fingers and pen to form letters and words. I cannot explain how I think. I can write what I think, I can tell what I think, but I cannot tell how the mind does this—how the mind has this power.

Now I might just as reasonably deny my own existence because I cannot understand how I exist as to deny the existence of an eternal, self-existent mind, intelligence, as the cause of all that exists because I cannot understand how that intelligence could be self-existent and eternal, without beginning and without end.

The fact is, something must be eternal, without beginning and without end, whether it be matter or spirit, or both, or else nothing could be now. And according to all our experience and knowledge here, mind or spirit is the power that controls matter; that influences and controls other minds; that controls every enterprise among men; that moves the world, as the saying goes. And why should we not reasonably come to the conclusion that the universe is controled in the same manner by an intelligent, invisible power, a mind, a spirit, a god, who handles matter as he pleases, as we do as far as we hav the power, and who has the exclusiv right to use it as he pleases, if he created it? And I think it is as susceptible of proof that it was created by an intelligent power as that it eternally existed without an intelligent cause, and that by some process of evolution as mysterious and incomprehensible as its eternal existence without a cause it should produce intelligence, produce mind, to control and govern itself, which would be just as inconceivable and incomprehensible as that it was created by an intelligent being, and much more so, because it would be contrary to all our experience, the analogy of things in nature, cause and effect, and every rule by which we are governed in the acquisition of knowledge.

It seems to be a generally received opinion that matter cannot be annihilated, and that consequently it must be eternal and could not hav been created. Now all that I can see in that is just this: that we are unable to annihilate matter. That does not prove that the Almighty cannot annihilate matter because we cannot do it. We cannot create it, but that does not prove that he cannot create matter. How can we know that the Almighty cannot annihilate matter? We say, because we hav never seen him do it. That proves nothing. How do I know that he has not annihilated worlds of matter? If he could create, why not undo what he had done? How do I know but that the great I Am could blot out this universe in the twinkling of an eye and still exist, the same eternal, self-existent being that he has eternally existed?

It is asserted by scientists that the moon cannot be inhabited because there is no atmosphere surrounding it. Now that is, assuming that the creator cannot create any other kind of beings but such as we are. I cannot see any good reason why the creator could not create beings with all our capacities, who could exist without an atmosphere as well as with one as easily as he could create amphibious animals, that can liv in either air or water, or fishes, which liv in water and die out of water in our atmosphere. And I hav no doubt but that the creator has created intelligent beings to inhabit the different worlds he has charge of with as great a diversity of physical organization as there is difference in the worlds they inhabit.

I think the Almighty has given us assurance enough of his all-sufficiency in what we can see in the universe of his creation, in the infinit variety he has given us in the countless millions of different orders and forms of existence, to satisfy us that all things are possible with him, except to contradict himself or make nature contradict nature, or himself to commit suicide. I don't believe the Almighty can kill himself.

Only Three Loaves of Bread.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I noticed when reading your letters during your previous tour that you spoke against the oppression of the laboring people wherever you found it. Now, in your tour around the world, will you please to tell us if you find any country which favors the laboring people less than old England, that great Christian land, with its established church? I hav just read of a poor, hard-working man there being sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for stealing three loaves of bread.

Bradlaugh, when lecturing in Philadelphia a few years ago, said that the Prince of Wales actually broke open a paymaster's chest and appropriated the money to his own personal use. If ten years' imprisonment is the recompense for stealing three loaves of bread, I wonder how many years the Prince should serve for his theft?

Oh, for shame! The English Parliament treated this crime as a cunning little joke, and actually appropriated a sum sufficient to cover the loss.

Speak, oh, speak, brave Bennett, against all such injustice—yea, against all oppressions, and let thy clarion notes for freedom ring with thee round the world!

To-day I follow Grace L. Parkhurst's example—renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER by sending the money which my fashionable friends think I should spend for a new hat. I can wear my old one with the happy consciousness of knowing I hav done that much more for reform.

Yours for truth and freedom, SADA BAILEY.

Parton's Life of Voltaire.

V.—THE ROSES, THE BURIAL, AND THE PANTHEON.

There is no exile like that which says to a Frenchman that he can never return to Paris. It was especially poignant to the sensitiv Voltaire, who cherished Paris as his birthplace and the heart of the great spirit-world of thought and feeling which beat in response to his own words and inspiration. For twenty-eight years he had been in effect an exile from the Paris world which loved him and which he loved. True, there were there 40,000 people who he said longed to carry fagots to burn him, but then there were 80,000 who longed to see him and who would carry water to extinguish the flames and exalt him as the victor over l'Infame. His niece and family urged him to spend a winter in the great city. His new play, Irene, had to be rehearsed and put on the stage effectivly. All joined to make him feel that he was needed in Paris. And so contrary to his better judgment, Feb. 3, 1778, "the Lord of Ferney and Tourney," at the age of eighty-four, set out for Paris.

It was the great, the irreparable, mistake of his life. He was not to meet the flames of persecution, but the hardly less fatal flames of apotheosis, accompanied by labor and excitement, which in less than four months exhausted the life which promised, like Fontenelle's, to reach its hundred years if spent in his country home.

His colonists and the country people gathered to bid him bon voyage with abundant tears, which showed their love and their presentment that at his age his departure meant a final farewell. At the last he seemed reluctant to go, and well he might. As proprietor, farmer, and protector a comfortable little world had gathered about him at Ferney, that with its nearness and closer ties might well have compensated for all the glory of the outer and greater world. We hav spoken of his refugee work colonies; and like all great men he had founded his life and heart-work upon the soil. He had become a farmer and producer to a very large extent.

His heart roots had struck deep into his lands, and whenever illness and literary work permitted he tried to till them with his own hands. If his neice and family had been contented to remain in their rural exile and to cherish him who was their all, as they should hav done, he would gladly hav remained and enjoyed a long sunny afternoon of life. But that was not to be. To understand what he left, nay, to understand the strength of the old Voltaire at all, these two charming pictures in Mr. Parton's words of the environment that nourished him are necessary:

"He appears to hav had farms which were as profitable as they were beautiful, and he assures us that he managed all the details of their culture himself. His letters for the next ten years teem with allusions to his farming. He exulted in a great barn, filled with the products of his lands:—

"A vast rustic house, with wagons loaded with the spoils of the fields coming and going by four great gateways. The pillars of oak, which sustain the whole frame, are placed at equal distances upon pedestals of stone; long stables are seen on the right and on the left. Fifty cows, properly fastened, occupy one side, with their calves; the horses and oxen are on the other side; their fodder falls into their racks from immense mows above; the floors where the grain is threshed are in the middle, and you know that all the animals lodged in their several places in this great edifice hav a lively sense that the forage, the hay, the oats which it contains belong to them of right. To the south of these beautiful monuments of agriculture are the poultry-yards and sheepfolds; to the north are the presses, store-rooms, fruit-houses; to the east are the abodes of the manager and thirty servants; toward the west extend large meadows, pastured and fertilized by all these animals, companions of the labor of man. The trees of the orchard, loaded with fruits, small and great, are still another source of wealth. Four or five hundred beehives are set up near a little stream which waters this orchard. The bees giv to the possessor a considerable harvest of honey and wax, without his troubling himself with all the fables which are told of that industrious creature, without endeavoring in vain to learn whether that nation livs under the rule of a pretended queen, who presents her subjects with sixty to eighty thousand children. There are some avenues of mulberry trees as far as eye can reach, the leaves of which nourish those precious worms which are not less useful than the bees. A part of this vast inclosure is formed by an impenetrable rampart of hawthorn, neatly clipped, which rejoices the senses of smell and sight."

In other letters we see him a zealous and patriotic tree-planter, sending wagons all the way to Lyons for loads of young trees, and urging country friends to follow his example. He formed a nursery, also, from which he every year enriched his plantations. "It is certain," he wrote to the inspector-general of French nurseries, "that the forests of France hav been too much neglected, as well as horse-breeding, and I fear that we shall soon be without the means of warming ourselvs. I am planting walnut and chestnut-trees upon which I shall never see walnuts or chestnuts, but the mania of people of my kind is to labor for posterity."

His plantations and his colts were among his favorit objects. As the years went on he formed a park and gardens about his new abode, three miles in circuit, which reminded visitors of what they had seen in England, where rural tastes were already well-nigh universal. One traveler describes them thus:

"The garden is very beautiful and very large, forming with the park an extensiv inclosure. In the park there is a fine plantation of oaks, lindens, and poplars, besides beautiful and lovely avenues. The view is extremely fine.

"Here, there is foliage and shrubbery, always green; there, a verdant lawn surrounded with clumps of bushes. In the midst is a large and ancient linden, with dense foliage, which overshadows the shrubbery with its thick branches. This is called the cabinet of Voltaire; it is there that he works. Near by is a little building for silk-worms, which serve him for recreation. Not far from it is a lightning-rod, the chain of which descends into a fountain. Adjacent to the silk-worm house there is a field, which is called Voltaire's field, because he cultivated it with his own hands. This park contains, besides, some beautiful labyrinths, a large peach orchard, lovely beds of flowers, vines of excellent grapes, kitchen and fruit gardens, the walls of which are entirely covered with pear-trees and peach-trees. Mont Blanc, which is seen covered with snow, and the gardens filled with flowers on all sides, form a contrast difficult to find elsewhere, and afford an enchanting prospect. Near the chateau is a bathhouse, a little marble edifice, supplied with hot and cold water at will, water being warmed in a boiler placed in a recess outside."

All this involved much out-of-door exercise, and he enjoyed it with a zest which the ordinary amateur little knows. For two or three years he was full to overflowing of this new occupation of founding a great country home.

"I owe life and health [he wrote to Mme. du Deffand] to the course I hav taken. If I dared I would believe myself wise, so happy am I. I hav lived only since the day when I chose my retreat; every other kind of life would now be unsupportable to me. Paris is necessary to you, to me it would be mortal; every one must remain in his element. I am very sorry that mine is incompatible with yours, and it is assuredly my only affliction. You wished also to try the country; it is not suitable to you. The taste for proprietorship and labor is absolutely necessary when you liv in the country. I hav very extensiv possessions, which I cultivate. I make more account of your drawing-room than of my grain-fields and my pastures, but it was my destiny to end my career between drills, cows, and Genevese."

From all this happy world the wheels of his carriage were the wheels of fate which bore him away forever.

At Paris he was received with open arms. The church and the court were silent, while the Academy, the theaters, and the masses of the people gave him ovation after ovation. It was in vain that he tried to escape a triumph that was plainly his. At the same time he was at work upon his play, and its rehearsals, under peculiar embarrassments and excitements. He had also determined that the French Academy should earn its right to exist by giving to the French people a great and authenticate dictionary of their language, a work which he began, and which has borne such glorious fruit in his own land, and by emulation in others.

It was too much. He was smothered under roses at the theater, burdened with honors at the Academy, and with work at home. He had attacks of illness, accompanied with spitting of blood, but bore up wonderfully and seemed to recover from them. His vitality was astonishing. As some of his friends said, it seemed that he could be killed by nothing short of a club on the head. But in the third week of May, 1878, he lay at the house of his family friend, The Villettes, near the Seine, very ill. The use of coffee at night when exhausted by mental labor had banished healthful sleep and made only the sleep of death possible.

His friends were anxious not only for him, but as to what should be done with his remains when the final sleep should come. The church then had its iron hand remorsely on the three great events of life, birth, marriage, and death. Unless buried with her sanction no burial, not even a decent dog's, was possible in France. Voltaire's "Mania," as he called it, was a love of his fellow-beings. A desire to hav his remains and memory incorporated with them in death was an earnest desire of his life. He had in early years seen the remains of the noble and accomplished actress Adrienne Lecouvreur "thrown into the kennels." He had striven to relieve her profession from a similar fate; he had built a tomb for himself by the side of his church at Ferney, but he had returned from exile there to find that the church could exile even from every grave. He and his friends tried to make a formal reconciliation that should giv the rights of burial, but when that was refused his last words were, "Let me die in peace."

On the last day of May, 1778, his life had ceased and the disposal of his remains was a sad puzzle indeed to his family and friends. The Paris clergy would not grant burial, and nothing more than the privilege of removal. The clergy at Ferney were ordered in no event to permit burial there. The Infamous determined that he who made France glorious should not rest in her bosom.

But the wiliness that had baffled his enemies so often did not desert him even after death. That fact was kept a profound secret; two carriages, one with six horses, in the evening of that day left his house as though a country gentleman was going to visit his country seat. The first carriage bore the body of Voltaire sitting on a seat in dressing-gown and night-cap, with attendants, as if an invalid. It reached Romilli on the Seine in Champagne, one hundred and ten miles east of Paris. The Abbé Mignot, the friend and relativ of Voltaire, induced the prior of the church there, who knew nothing of the interdicts and of what had occurred at Paris, to grant burial to "his uncle" who had died suddenly, he said, without being able to be removed to Ferney.

The prior granted the request. The body was, by help of the village undertaker and prior, decently, honorably, and sacredly buried in the consecrated ground.

When the fact of the removal from Paris became suspected the interdict reached the prior, but too late, he could only plead to his superiors the fact as innocently done—but done it was! Thus the old fox seemed to hav eluded his pursuers and to hav found his final and longed-for home in the earth. Only seemed, for the malice of the Infamous never sleeps. We shall see how nearly forty years afterward, in the silence of night and of their power, unknown to the world, they wreaked their vengeance on his remains, which by the chance of war fell into their hands.

But to return to Paris. There one of the strangest of events occurred, a thing possible only under despotism. When Voltaire became extremely ill his friends were silent so as to obtain if possible honorable disposal of his remains. When he was dead the hearts of his friends, of the people, of the press, of France, were repressed by an interdict that prevented even the mention of his name! It was as if the sun at noonday had vanished by a permanent eclipse. He who had been upon every tongue, almost the day before, was lost, and none knew what had become of him, nor why the strange silence. What everyone wished to know could be learned only in whispers.

Before long epigrams, which always "temper despotism," began to appear. Gradually the story of his sickness, death, and burial by stratagem became known to the world outside of France. The indignation of all intelligent and honorable people of Europe rose against the Infamous, until they felt the recoil of the indignity which had prevented fair, open, and honorable burial of the great Frenchman in his nativ soil. The royal Frederic of Prussia, before the Academy of Arts and Sciences at Berlin, in his famous Eulogium on Voltaire, expressed the sentiment of the civilized world in words that touched the heart of France:

"Blinded by a false zeal, drunk with fanaticism, they (the priests) prevent the last duties of humanity from being paid to one of the most famous men France has ever produced. The best destiny they can look for is that they and their vile artifices will remain forever buried in the darkness of oblivion, while the fame of Voltaire will increase from age to age, and transmit his name to immortality." He denounced the treatment which the remains of Voltaire had received as disgraceful to savages. His words made every Frenchman who understood them long for the time when it could be shown that The Infamous was not France.

The time came. The body of Voltaire slept by the country church of Champagne until the tenth of July, 1791. During those fourteen years his soul had been marching on. The despotism and the Infamous had vanished from France. The NATIONAL ASSEMBLY was in their place, and it had decreed that the ashes of Voltaire "should be transferred from the church of Romilli to THE PANTHEON in Paris."

In another column we giv Mr. Parton's own account of this act of justice and gratitude. It stirs the heart as if with a trumpet. It is a noble event, and it is most nobly told. Where in all literature can we feel a grander march of popular triumph than in his sentences. The heart of France was free at last, and while the armies of despotism were gathering on its borders, it turned to honor Voltaire as their real deliverer.

But the progress of mankind is not even; it is rhythmic. When an eddy occurs shallow people think that revolutions go backward, and that the stream of time is reversed. The selfish Bonaparte betrayed the Revolution which made him, and the despots throttled him, and in 1814 the Infamous returned to Paris. What occurred then? An event which proved that Voltaire was not mistaken when he summed up despotism and superstition in one word—the Infamous.

The last of the story of Voltaire's remains is told in the conclusion of the extract we publish to-day, from Mr. Parton, ending, "God, thou shalt be avenged!"

Was there ever such a mode of revenge taken for a god except by the savages?

The god that has to be revenged in this way is the god of ghouls! The deliberate and stealthy dishonor and destruction of those remains which a nation had deposited in the sacred and honored keeping of those who held its power was a double desecration—first of the mighty genius itself, and then of the national trust and love. It was more, it was also an act of treason against common decency and humanity, against liberty and the instinct of progress. It was an act that should never be forgotten; and especially should those who advocate the superstition which caused it be never permitted to forget it. Let those who wear the dress of the clergy remember that it is the uniform of the Infamous until they effectually disown this act of infamy. Was it justified by the acts of Voltaire? Did he carry on his controversy so as to be placed beyond the pale of human beings? We answer, No! Those who raise the black flag must not complain of retaliation. Those who outlaw, persecute, and burn hav no right to complain when they are also beaten in the war of intellect and wit which they themselvs provoked.

But was not Voltaire a hypocrit? No, not in any fair sense of the word. The church and state were one in France. It was not a free country like America, or even England. The rites of the church with confession, absolution, and communion were civil offices without which he would hav been outlawed and deprived of property, means of living, and perhaps life. He had a right under such circumstances to say to the authorities, "I will conform to the outward grimaces, but I will show you that they are nothing but grimaces by a life devoted to truth."

But further, it must be remembered that Voltaire was in conviction and heart a Deist and a philanthropist. He was honest in preserving the sense of reverence for deity, and in turning the sentiments of religion into sentiments of humanity. Such was the substance of all of his so-called confessions and acts of religion. In estimating his character attention to this view has been strangely overlooked. Thus he said in regard to the church which he caused to be built and inscribed Deo erexit Voltaire: "This church which I hav had built is the only church in the universe dedicated to God alone. All the others are dedicated to saints; for my part, I prefer to build a church to the master than to his valets."

But did he not directly justify falsehood? Yes, but only in the same way that the Jesuits did and in his contests with them or some form of The Infamous. For instance, from a bishop who tried to involve him and his parish and church and curé in a legal prosecution for heresy that would perhaps ruin them all, he escaped by the most innocent but amusing falsehoods. When taxed with them by his friends, he replied: "He is one of the most malignant persons breathing. In a word, it was necessary to fight this man with his own weapons." With those who loved and regarded truth he was the soul of truth. He spent his life in its pursuit. His mistakes and limitations are the more noticeable by contrast, because he manfully persisted in the battle for truth.

He lived to make truth possible. Science, that which is really true, that which man can really know, he insisted should take the place of church dogmas and exploded fables. Humanity and its service, he urged, should take the place of worship to God in the interests of despotism and priestcraft. Said Casanova to him, "Your predominant passion is love for the human race."

Again Voltaire said of his farm, "I am planting walnut and chestnut-trees upon which I shall never see walnuts or chestnuts, but the mania of my kind is to labor for posterity." Labor of this kind, prompted by the passion of love for mankind, must not be allowed to fade from the memory of man. That love is at once a treasure and an inspiration, and it must endure. Through the depths of the ages men will turn to Shakspere the Revealer, Voltaire the Deliverer, and Goethe the Reconciler of the souls of men upon earth.

To understand these men, to present their lives and labors under the light of a final judgment, is a work that calls forth a gratitude akin to that which we owe to those demi-gods themselvs. Such gratitude belongs to their faithful biographers. And in this instance we cannot close this, our last article on this great work, without an expression of it to our author. It is to his patient heart, head, and hand that we owe the first fair and complete picture in our language of the great man of France, one of the greatest and most useful of men, though certainly "one of the most remarkable of Frenchmen and of human beings."

To portray this man and his work was indeed a great undertaking, and it has been faithfully and grandly done. We are glad that those who thus raise the torch of truth to rescue from oblivion the true servants of Humanity cannot but be themselvs revealed by the light they bear. The source of this light, so just and true, so mild and beneficent, which Mr. Parton has thrown around Voltaire, we know to be the author's own just mind and sympathetic heart. No tribunal more competent has ever been called to judge the servants of Man. T. B. W.

Freethinkers' Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the New York State Freethinkers' Association will be held, as already announced, Aug. 31st, Sept. 1st, 2d, and 3d next. One way to make this meeting at Hornellsville a success is for those who cannot attend to write a short letter on some vital topic, not forgetting to giv statistics of the number and condition of Freethinkers and their societies in their neighborhood, addressed to the chairman of the meeting, in care of Mr. H. L. Green (the pilot). From such letters, when they are numerous enough and cover the whole country, we shall be able to gather materials for showing how strong the cause is in numbers, institutions, courage, and I would like to add activity. By showing our forces we shall compel respect from our adversaries, and until a good solid front is paraded we shall be worried with petty wars without and bickerings within the camp. One other suggestion to New York friends who cannot be there in person—kindly send a contribution to the treasury for expenses. This is a state association, and could do a greater and better work if there was a fund for printing.

I hav accepted a call to lecture at Rochester before the League, and will serve at other places on the way between that city and this on short notice.

What Mr. Mair has Failed to Prove.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For a long time I hav been reading the able discussion between Mr. Mair and Mr. Bennett. In all the writings of Mr. Mair he has given no proof that the Bible was written by the inspiration of God, nor has he proved that a human being can be born or brought into existence without a human father, or that any other animal came into existence in opposition to the natural causes that ever produced effects.

Mr. Mair would not call all men Infidels who would not believe Buddha was born without a human father; he cannot believe it himself, though there are many who as surely believe he was as Mr. Mair does that Jesus came into existence unnaturally. In his discussion, how can he tell what Christ meant (as he pretends) when he says, "I came not to send peace, but a sword." Mr. Mair must be a little insane when he doubts that many who read THE TRUTH SEEKER hav not education sufficient to spell the word science, and hav no knowledge of its meaning. We can inform Mr. Mair the youngest scholars who can read the Bible can never believe the Lord divided the waters by a blast from his nostrils, nor that the sun ever stood still for one whole day by the command of Joshua, and a thousand other impossibilities contained in that book which he pretends—as it is certainly only pretense in a man of his understanding—to believe to be true.

He has proved nothing of what is to come, only from data given of what has been. He has proved nothing to the ignorant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER only that many of the professors of Christianity would like to chain the wheels of science by keeping in ignorance a sufficient number to maintain colossal churches and to donate enough to support priests in the pulpit and preachers of the parish.

Mr. Mair is certainly not as ignorant as he says many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are; therefore he must believe the existence of all matter and things is the result of combined natural causes, and the disappearance to any one or all of the five senses is the effect of the organization of nature. Credit Mr. Mair with having some mother wit if he acknowledges the last paragraph to be true.

Moody and Sankey Again.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The great evangelists, Moody and Sankey, are here. I am just home from their meeting, and this being my first sight of them your readers will please pardon me for calling their attention to these two co-workers for Christ. I had been led to expect something, to hear such an eloquent appeal for the salvation of sinners as would melt the hardest heart. I had often been told, by those who had heard Mr. Moody, that if I ever heard him preach, his successful "reasoning" would turn me from the "error" of my way, would bring me into the fold of the elect. Ha! ha! poor, innocent dupes! I pity you from the innermost recesses of my heart. That you or any one with common intelligence should consider Mr. Moody an eloquent speaker, much less a logical reasoner, is beyond my comprehension.

The meeting to-night was held in the Central Presbyterian church, it being the largest church in the city, having a seating capacity of twelve hundred. Of course it was crowded. Twelve hundred tickets were issued, and none could gain admission without the necessary pasteboard. After music by the choir of fifty voices, Sankey, pious, sanctified Sankey, led in "I love to tell the story," "In the cross," etc., etc. Then Mr. Moody read the program for the balance of the week. Then Mr. Sankey sang a solo, and "we all joined in the chorus."

We had scarcely got well fitted in our seats again when Mr. Moody was on his feet, and after making some apology for the absence of light near the pulpit, he said his talk to-night would be "What Jesus wishes to be to you." After telling what Christ would and wished to do for us poor, diseased sinners, he said, "Christ was not only a man; he was more than a man; he was God and man, and he delivers us from sin and from the temptation to sin, thus demonstrating his supernatural power." Just how Mr. Moody happens to know this, I am not able to state.

He went over the same ground so often gone over by the ignorant backwoods revivalist, and stepping as far to the front as possible, and making a sweeping gesture, "This is no myth we preach," said he, "but a living truth, as sure as the sun shines."

That settles the Jesus question. Know all doubters that Jesus' power is a fact, for Moody says so. And all the time Sankey looked as solemn as the running-gear of a dyspeptic katydid. "Never knew a man to go to God in his extremity," said Moody, "but that he found sure relief." And Sankey never smiled. Mr. Moody dwelt at length on the supernatural power of Jesus Christ, and "every deliverance from sin," he said, "is a supernatural deliverance." And Sankey's eyes rolled around, and he seemed well pleased.

Then the funny feeling came over Moody and he related a circumstance. I guess it was a circumstance. Anyhow, he saw an elegant painting or steel engraving in the city of San Francisco. It was in a minister's house, and it was a picture of Jesus with a lighted lantern in his hand, knocking at the door of a sinner's house (of course it was a sinner's house), and he said if he owned that picture he would hang it with the face next to the wall, for "Christ is the light of the world, the light of life." And everybody smiled—but Sankey.

Then he told a solemn story. One of his dear friends lost all his children, and he and his wife went to the East to try to find comfort there. But they could not forget their children. One day they saw a shepherd trying to coax some sheep across a river. But they wouldn't coax. So the shepherd went back to shore, and got two little lambs, and put them in his bosom, or rather in the bosom of his frock, and waded out in the river, and the mothers of these two lambs followed him, and (sheep will follow) he got them across the river and put the darling little lambs down by their mothers and turned them all into greener pastures, and then the father and mother knew that "God does all things for the best," and they found comfort in that thought. Still Sankey wouldn't smile. When his children came to his grave he wanted them to say, "Papa always pointed us to Jesus." No smile from Sankey. He didn't say whether he wanted them to say, "Papa was always good and kind to us," but, "he pointed them to Jesus."

It would perhaps be difficult to offer anything new about this emotional religion, but I want to add my mite to what has been said. I am eternally and firmly opposed to it. It should hav gone out of the world with the coming in of liberty. When people were hugging their chains and blessing the power that kept them beneath the feet of tyrants, it may hav been a blessing to become excited and lung about the myths of the other world, but we should expect something more rational of a people with a hundred years of liberty and school-houses. This Moodyism is as foolish to thinking people as Mormonism is is Moody. So far from being converted, I am firmer on the rock of free inquiry, free speech, and free press.

"This life, sae far as I understand,
Is an enchanted fairy land,
Where pleasure is the magic wand,
That, wielded right,
Makes hours, like minutes, hand-in-hand,
Dance by full light.

Denver, Col. O. G. P.

Mr. Mair's Ignorance of History.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav not had the time to spare to read the discussion which has for some time been going on between Mr. Mair and yourself relativ to the claims, merits, and origin of Christianity; but I hav glanced over the articles sufficiently to observe that Mr. Mair displays a great amount of ignorance relativ to ancient religious history, the character of the old systems of religion, and the doctrins, principles, and precepts of the oriental systems. And to this ignorance I ascribe the unyielding tenacity with which he adheres to the worn-out traditions and superstitions of the Christian system.

No man who will acquaint himself with the principles and legitimate bearings of the twenty-seven sciences now in the course of rapid development in the civilized world, and the important theological lesson which they teach us, and who will also avail himself of the benefits derivable from the vast acquisitions of knowledge attained in the field of historical research within the last half century, can for a moment entertain the belief that Christianity is either an original system or a true system in science or morals.

Those twenty-seven sciences hav brought to light no less than nine thousand scientific errors in the Christian Bible and its religion, while modern researches in history hav traced all its doctrins and precepts to older systems, stigmatized by Christians as pagan, or heathen.

Every miraculous event recorded in the history of Christ, from that of his miraculous birth to his ascension into "the house of many mansions," is found in the history of incarnate gods who figured in the world long before the birth of Christ.

But as Mr. Mair appears to be ignorant of these facts, and has called for the proof of some of them, I will gratify his laudable curiosity and try to enlighten his ignorance by bringing some of these facts to his notice. With respect to the first great event in Christ's earthly history—the immaculate conception, as also that of the miraculous birth—permit me to say to Mr. Mair that if he will read Grote's "History of Greece," Ranking's "History of the Moguls," Malcom's "History of Persia," Plaisted's "Oriental History," etc., he will find many cases related of young maidens being "overshadowed" by Jehovah, Jupiter, Brahma, Fohi, Tien, Baal, or Bel, or some other divine potentate or amorous god or omnipotent "Freelover," and giving birth to a little prattling, squalling, he-deity.

Will Mr. Mair please inform us, if he is sufficiently into the secrets of the divine councils, why the little baby god always turned out to be a boy? That is a mystery of godliness no priest is able to explain. Why did they use women as wives, but never as daughters? Or why did none of them ever become father to a daughter as well as a son? Please explain.

2. Again, Mr. Mair assumes that Christ's humble birth finds no parallel in the history of the heathen gods. He should read more history. The historical resemblance of the gods in this respect is quite striking. Several of them were born, like Christ, in a cave. Perhaps Mr. Mair will not admit that Christ was born in a cave. To settle the matter I will quote Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," a work in every Christian library. It says, "The Greek fathers generally agree that the place of Christ's birth was a cave" (p. 568). According to the reverend missionary, Allen (see his "Judea," p. 379), Chrishna of India was born in a cave. Mithra of Persia, Osirus of Egypt, Adonis of Greece, were also reputedly born in caves. Will Mr. Mair please explain this historical resemblance?

3. Mr. Mair would also hav us believe that the stars paid no attention to the births of any of the gods but that of Christ. Here again his historical knowledge is short. Yu of Cochin, Chrishna of India, Crite of Chaldea, Mithra of Persia, Eros of the Druids, and other gods were repeatedly honored at birth by some starry world of immense magnitude breaking loose from its orbit and running after them to do them homage, or, as in the case of Sakia of India, announcing their birth. See Plaisted, p. 87. The stars treat all the gods alike.

4. The angels of heaven and the shepherds and wise men of earth showed about the same respect for one god as another, Mr. Mair to the contrary notwithstanding, as he thinks Christ alone received this honor. Here he should take another lesson in history. A chorus of angels announced the birth of Chrishna, wise men (the magi) visited the infant savior Mithra at birth, and shepherds paid their respects to Osiris the day he was born. See Plaisted, 146, for these and several similar cases, all reported in history before the birth of Christ. When Osiris of Egypt was born, 642 B.C., "angels flew to the scene, shepherds surrounded the cradle, and wise men came from a distance and made him an offering of frankincense and myrrh" (So says Colgate's Egypt, p. 92). Please read another chapter of history, friend Mair.

Thus the parallel runs through the miraculous history of all the incarnate, virgin-born gods. They were borrowed from each other. Christ was the last in the list, and his history was culled principally from Egypt and India. More than twenty gods are reported as having been crucified, and several of them, like Christ, while their bodies were reposing in the tomb, descended to hell, and after roasting there three days cut loose and came back to earth, and finally ascended to the "house of many mansions," and took their seats at the right hand of the father of all gods. Christ, being the last, had to take his seat at the far end of the bench. The Holy Ghost also figured with some of the gods, both in heaven and earth. And the religious rites and doctrins of the gods were chips cut out of the same block. Their creeds included a belief in baptism both by water and fire, also in the trinity, the "divine word," the sacrament, "regeneration by a new birth," etc., etc., as I expect to show hereafter. Brother Mair has several times called in question the truth of some of my statements, as found in "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and "The Bible of Bibles." I advise him to read those works and then read oriental history and compare them together, and if he finds one important statement there is ground for doubting the truth of let him repeat it to me, and if I fail to find history to support it he may hav my head for a foot-ball, in accordance with the ancient Christian penalty for believing history and disbelieving creeds.

Kersey Graves.

Richmond, Indiana.

Church and State in California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As church property is nominally taxed in this state, and as the constitutional provisions are clearly against any religious discriminations, unsophisticated persons not versed in the wicked wiles of politicians and ecclesiastics might regard the title of this article as a misnomer. For their information I cull this episode from an investigation of San Quentin (state) prison now in progress.

The law is that the warden is to appoint his assistants. How it is evaded is shown by the following extract from the testimony of one of said assistants, designated "moral instructor," the incumbent being Rev. H. Cummings, and the expression a dodge to cover the payment by the state for the teachings of the church:

"I consider that I was invited to the position of instructor by Governor Perkins. He offered me the position, and after I had agreed to take it I asked him who had the appointing power, he or the directors, and he said, 'I will make it a specific point in appointing the warden and directors that you shall be appointed to the position.' I think that at that time some of the directors had been decided upon. He told me that he would see to it that I was appointed after the directors and warden were appointed."

Mr. Mills spent some time in arriving at the purpose and theory of the witness' employment in the jail, eliciting the information that the purpose was to work for the reformation of the prisoners, and that the theory was that this was only to be accomplished by inducing them "to giv their hearts to God and be born again," so that they would sincerely adopt and practice the divine precepts. At least that was the only way in which the witness had confidence of a permanent reform, and to that end he labored in an unsectarian way.

That is the way politicians get over even express enactments to keep our penal and other institutions non-partisan.

But the cream of it lies on what Mr. Mills elicited, that this "moral instructor" was to reform the prisoners by making them believe in orthodox theories covered up in the expression "giving their hearts to God," which means in Saxon-English vernacular that provided you can swallow the "vicarious atonement" theory and rely upon the "blood of Christ" to cleanse your sins, works are of minor consequence, and you can steal, lie, forge, murder, or do anything else that is bad provided you are O. K. on theological questions at time of death. This is glorious teaching whereby to reform criminals. This doctrin is certainly capable of filling prisons, but the man who tries to hold water in a sieve is sane compared with the one who expects to empty them, in whole or in part, by such a process. However, that is what the people must pay for as long as they believe in the present infernal system of so-called "representativ" government, under which Liberal speakers and writers must starve or quit, while priests and politicians fatten in fooling the people.

Alfred Cridge.

San Francisco, Cal., July 8, 1881.

To solicit and persuade one another are privileges which belong to us all; and the wiser and better man is bound to advise the less wise and good. But he is not only not bound, but he is not allowed, speaking generally, to coerce him.—W. E. Gladstone.

Misunderstood.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I perceive by an article in your paper of June 18th, entitled, "The Spiritual What-Is-It?" from the pen of W. F. Jamieson, that he fails entirely to understand my position regarding the opinion of some of his utterances, as well as his rights and integrity. The cause of his complaint he finds in "Fair Play," which appeared in your paper some time last April; and in order to justify what Mr. Bedell says he (Jamieson) uttered, he givs us a lucid definition of the word "humbug."

My charges were based on the natural inference that the mass of the common mind would draw, and which Mr. Bedell did understand by his clear elucidation that followed. The mass of readers are day laborers like myself, who hav little time to hunt for the roots of words. We accept them as right or wrong according to their generally understood meaning and their relation to other words in the sentence or paragraph. Professors may be able to root around to find the tubers of words, and which, after found, are often obsolete to ordinary mortals. The main object of my writings has been an effort to unite our forces to secure full freedom of speech, the press, and the mails, for the sole reason that I consider this object the most important of the hour.

In the effort to aid in achieving so important an object it is quite possible that my language, in all respects, may not hav been well chosen; but this is certain: there has been no desire to misrepresent Mr. Jamieson or any one else; and of this fact the gentleman may rest assured, that his change of intellectual base does not annoy me one particle, for I esteem any individual, however great in his or her opinion, of little importance to aid or retard the onward sweep of ideas that ever and anon germinate and culminate amid the steady march and revolution of added centuries.

"Lynn logic" is not as he represents it. As seen through his glasses, and distorted by his rendering, it is entirely too narrow to suit any taste.

I would inform that gentleman that I hav not read a word from any Spiritual paper, pro or con, regarding him. My conclusions were based on what I read from The Truth Seeker in Mr. Bedell's article, and the several communications in the same from his own pen. This was my source of information. Could there hav been a more correct one?

In most of these there seemed, to my mind, a tendency and desire to antagonize instead of unify our forces. It was Jamieson against Spiritualism, and it looked like the inflated effort of a new convert, in his milk season, to demonstrate the integrity of the change, his enthusiasm for his new love, and the immense value of his services in the new field.

These conclusions were the result of his talk about persecution, of his comparing the conduct of Spiritualists toward him as being in spirit and act like the Catholics to Protestants, and Christians to Spiritualists.

While I honestly think the writer meant to be truthful, men of his class fail to understand the common people. As a rule, we are simple, and if a man is a glib talker and spends his time in the lecture field, we pet them and partly make them think they are above the common herd, to which we belong; that is, as long as they talk and tickle us. When they cease doing so we use less sugar, and the pets get the pouts. This is my solution. I think Bro. Jamieson has the pouts, and when these are over, and the milk bottle is laid aside, his vision will be clearer and digestion good.

How amusing to think my critic can get along without my blessing, and that he prefers loyalty to convictions to a place in my good opinions! I want to laugh; 'tis so comical. Why, my dear sir, I am only a shoemaker who has worked at the bench for over forty years, and, with the exception of a little public writing and some public speaking, could only teach by example.

These are some of my conclusions: First, that great men and women, as a rule, are much smaller than people imagin them; and secondly, the "common folk," or little men and women, hav more practical good sense and mentally weigh more than they get credit for.

Again, I esteem it in very bad taste for any party that has honestly entertained a certain set of religious, political, or other opinions, with any reasonably sized body of people for any length of time to raise the cry of humbug regarding those opinions as soon as he or she sees differently; and if Spiritualists or others are guilty of this conduct, it is dishonest, to say the least.

Take my own case. At one time I was an enthusiastic Methodist, and after became just as earnest for the spread of Universalism. Suppose I had denounced Methodism as a humbug, would I not hav been dishonest? Would it not hav been the proclamation of my own former dishonesty? So it seems to me, as the common mind understands the word. In addition, it would hav been a lie of the worst form. Methodism was a godsend to the English masses; it came as a democratic liberator from the thraldom of the (that day) vicious, aristocratic Episcopal church.

There always seems to be this trouble with us, and it exists among the scientists as well as the theologians, that whatever position we occupy 'tis the right and true one; and already we see cropping out here and there an offensiv disposition to make a creed for Liberals in the place of securing that freedom of speech, press, and the mails that will alone make true Liberalism possible. My definition of what "true Liberalism" is hath this extent, no more: It is not a question of belief or disbelief. It is simply a question of justice, a clear recognition of human rights—a disposition to hear as well as be heard, to guard as jealously (or more so) the rights of others as to guard or defend your own.

Until we are as willing that others shall enjoy their gods, devils, and angels as we are to ridicule them in the main as absurdities, we are bigots, and if we are not as desirous to protect them in their rights as we are to claim protection for ours, we contain the germs of the Inquisition, and all we lack is opportunity to exhibit its fruit. Still farther, a constant disposition to ridicule what others esteem sacred is neither just nor generous. Liberalism teaches me to hav courage to advocate and defend principles or persons that I esteem right and true, but courage may be courteous, and mentally there is quite as much difference between the different kinds as between that represented on the one hand by the bulldog and the prize-ring bruiser and by Garrison and his compeers on the other.

Experience teaches this lesson, that bigotry and Liberalism grow side by side—neither stands entirely alone. Sometimes the most intolerant bigotry is found with those whose mental conclusions are the broadest and most in accord with the strongest claims of science, while the best illustrations (in isolated cases) of "true Liberalism" are found among the least cultured and most orthodox. Such, in part, is my experience.

It is true, as a rule, that the radical progressiv element is the most tolerant, but as all sects and parties are tolerant when a small minority, it remains to be seen just what we would be if strong enough to rule.

I cannot think of safety apart from simple justice to one another, and on the recognition of which I base the hope for the grand and noble manhood and womanhood which Mr. Jamieson refers to. I hav no desire for a personal controversy with the learned professor, but I do desire to see all our strength concentrated to secure the freedom of the mails, the voice, and the pen. After these are secured, and every subject that concerns the race intellectually, morally, and physically is opened for honest discussion and investigation, it may be well for the columns of The Truth Seeker to, by way of spice, allow Mr. Jamieson to shoot off his pop-guns to annihilate the few deluded Spiritualists that remain. Until that time comes would it not be as well to meet the common foe and thunder at the doors of the capitol for a clear recognition of our chartered and natural rights?

Thumping Christian Lies.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The following statements in Judge Black's letter to Ingersoll in the North American Review for August hav been so often repeated that to refute them occasionally seems a necessary service, in no way personally unkind to the last man who has displayed his ignorance by using them.

The first of Judge Black's assertions which seems worth criticising is that Christianity is not declining, but rather increasing. A few months ago I published in the New York Sun some statistics copied from the best Christian authority, which were copied by your paper and many others, and which proved that during the last thirty years the number of churches of all denominations in America had grown less in proportion to population, and that in an increasing ratio, and that their capacity had fallen off still faster. Since then I hav seen the ecclesiastical statistics of England, which giv very similar results. That the Protestant parts of continental Europe hav become Infidel is a universal subject of Christian lamentation, and no man in his senses will doubt that the power of the church in all Catholic countries has declined since the battle of Waterloo. In view of all this, he who maintains that Christianity is holding its own simply misrepresents notorious facts.

Judge Black repeats the stale slanders of Christian malice against other religions, and in so doing falls into the absurdest historical errors. He talks of the worship of Bacchus with its drunken orgies, but if he will read so common a book as Grote's History of Greece he may learn that the "orgies" of Bacchus did not consist in getting drunk; that Silenus, rather than Bacchus, was the jolly god of dissipation; that intemperance, instead of being pleasing to Bacchus, was considered the effect of his anger, and that his worshipers (mostly women) sought to avert this curse from their husbands, fathers, and brothers by "orgies"—that is, frantic and furious religious exercises, like those of a modern camp-meeting, but never got drunk.

He says the enemies of the Jews were mere savages, and on this ground justifies their own cruelty. What a charge to make against the noble race which circumnavigated Africa, sailed to India, and produced Hamilcar and Hanno and Hannibal! Judge Black should wake up from the Rip Van Winkle sleep of barbarism and learn that there are a few people who hav read history with new lights since he went to school.

Elsewhere he says that in the late war we sacrificed, to put down treason, more lives than Judea ever contained at one time. Has he forgotten that in on Jewish battle 500,000 men were killed? Or does he not, perhaps, believe it?

In replying to Ingersoll's remarks upon polygamy Judge Black says it is Christianity alone that has extirpated polygamy wherever carried. This is simply and unqualifiedly false. Polygamy never existed in any country which has adopted Christianity except Abyssinia, and there it flourishes now.

The arguments by which Judge Black attempts to prove the authenticity of the gospels hav been so often refuted that they are not worth noticing, and his replies to Ingersoll's criticisms on Christian doctrins merely show his own orthodoxy to be extremely shaky.

But when he tries to prove that Christianity is not a persecuting religion he is driven again to the most bald misrepresentation. "Louis XIV.," he says, "revoked the edict of Nantes, and banished the Waldeneses" (Huguenots, Judge!) "under pain of confiscation and death; but this was done on the declared ground that the victims were not safe subjects." It would indeed be hard, even for a Christian, to get more falsities into the same space. Louis did not banish the Huguenots, but on the contrary refused to let them leave, though many did. Confiscation and death were not the methods employed to convert them, but deprivation of sleep, starvation of infants, and the constant outrages of a brutal soldiery, were. The edict of Nantes was revoked on the ground that the above cruelties, continued for many years, had abolished heresy, and that an edict permitting heretical worship had become unnecessary, not on the ground that any one was an "unsafe subject."

I hav only noticed in Judge Black's article a few points which I know to be historically false, and that only because some who read him may not know it. Undoubtedly Ingersoll is quite capable of meeting single-handed all criticism on himself.

Good—Not so Good.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Mr. Roger de Goey's suggestion in The Truth Seeker of July 16th is a good one. Cannot we act upon it? What better way can we find by which to inform prospectiv American citizens of the ideas and principles now seeking to mold the institutions of this country? For instance, the question of woman suffrage meets with but little encouragement comparativly from our foreign-born population, and it is the desire to curry favor with this vote which prevents more than anything else the political parties from taking a fair stand in favor of this most just reform. Now, cannot we supply emigrants at Antwerp with the necessary documents touching this as also the question of state secularization in all its various phases? Foresight is far better than hindsight, and I hope our secularists will take hold of this matter in earnest. Let a committee, composed of representativs of the various Freethought publishing houses and dealers in Liberal literature, be at once formed for the purpose of supplying to our Antwerp brethren our secular publications on the best terms possible. Who seconds the motion?

Says David Bruce, "I cannot from my standpoint of knowledge estimate any writer or public speaker a humanitarian, philanthropist, or reformer who exultingly trifles with the belief in immortality, and in addition attempts to create a love for the blanching doctrin of the soul's annihilation." Again, "As the surviving mortal lays away the remains of one once cherished—perhaps of a father, mother, benefactor, or friend—his memory should not be embittered and chilled with the icy pall of eternal oblivion."

From my standpoint I must say that the odium theologicum animates to altogether too great an extent these lines of friend Bruce. Has not the Materialist the same right to "exultingly" proclaim his belief as has the Spiritualist to proclaim his? Nay, is it not his duty to announce the truth as he sees it? By what right does friend Bruce deny to Charles Bradlaugh the name of humanitarian, philanthropist, or reformer? All truths are not pleasant, but many people with a theological bias assume that because an asserted fact does not tally with their preconceived notions it must of necessity hav an injurious effect upon the human mind, and they at once, like Mr. Bruce, jump at the conclusion that any man holding such, to them, erroneous views must be lacking in some of the attributes which go to make up the genuin humanitarian.

Supernaturalists mistake their feelings and desires for scientific facts oftentimes, and say that such and such things "should not" be taught, etc., when the real truth seeker will only inquire, "Is it true?" not "Ought it to be true?"

Letters from Friends.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., July 31, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: At last I think that I hav obtained for you all the shares I can get at present, and am happy to be able to inclose you draft for $65.00. Much of this I hav had from friends of the cause for some time past, and some I hav myself advanced for others who I know will pay me. When I saw that my offer of eight shares was the highest offer made I became ambitious to be the largest contributor to the fund, and concluded that fifteen would probably do it. I obtained the names, as I hav previously advised you, but two were more willing than able, and seeing you had another contribution of twenty shares, I gave up the prospect of being the largest, very willingly taking the second place in the ranks, and will, not reluctantly, be willing to see many advance to positions above me in their contributions to a fund to help you on your journey of investigation, and from which I hope much may be learned by inquiring minds regarding the truthfulness of the many traditional accounts that hav been handed down to us as facts by the paid agents of the theological institutions of the Christian world and been accepted as such by the followers after and believers in the superstitions belonging to an ignorant era in the existence of the human family of many ages ago.

Like many others, I am loth to hav you go, as your hand will be missed from the helm of THE TRUTH SEEKER, however ably you may be represented there, but nevertheless I think your path of duty lies plainly before you. which is, that in order that you and we may successfully cope with our adversaries it is necessary that you get at the fountain-head of this mythical idea embodied in the Christian religion and tear. Samson-like, the pillars from under the foundations of the whole structure, leaving if possible not one stone resting upon another. Raze the walls to the ground, destroy every vestige of this relic of barbarism, and let us start out anew, substituting for this hollow farce, as a more reasonable guide, our common sense and the experience, the possible knowledge, of the civilized and enlightened minds of the present age. May your researches lead others to investigate the truth or falsity of these vagaries of Christianity and cause them to see in all their glaring, hideous shapes the methods to which the priesthood hav resorted in order to maintain their supremacy over the minds of men and cause the whole Christian world to cast aside as a thing of no further use to them in the present advanced intelligence of the world, these old legends that originated far, far back in the dim vista of human knowledge and in the brain of infants when compared to the human intellect of to-day.

Only take good care of yourself, so that you may return and be the better able to fight our battles for us these many years to come, but hope you may be more fortunate next time and meet an antagonist who, when whipped, will know it, and when unable to answer your arguments, will hav the manhood to come out and acknowledge his inability to do so, and not pass them by without notice, as your friend Mr. Mair invariably did. They cannot answer them, and in order to make their good living sure they must make a big blow and use high-sounding words and vague meanings in order to satisfy the credulity of their blind followers.

On your return endeavor to visit this place if possible, when I will devote my time to showing you over our gold and silver-lined county, and deeper down in the bowels of the earth than you hav probably ever been. I can obtain as a following or body guard more disciples than Jesus was reported to hav had while on earth, and with no Judas in the crowd either, as we hav no use for such, preferring to leave them to the churches, where they belong. I will not agree to show you through the churches, however, as I am proscribed among them. Three out of the six are vacant. One of the three during the past two months had a minister. Prior to that time it had been idle for many years. Thinking to benefit the trustees by a rental, and also ourselvs. I tried to negotiate for it. in the interest of a pool, for the purpose of a public hall. I never intimated for what exact purpose we wished to use it. After this minister of God, the kind shepherd of this church, had been here a short time he learned of my negotiation and also that I was an Infidel, and supposing no doubt I wished it for the use of Liberal lectures, etc., he very kindly remarked that had he been there he would hav kicked me from the top to the bottom of the stairs, which stairs lead from the street to the second story, where the audience room is situated. Now, inasmuch as I weigh nearly 180 lbs. avoirdupois, stand almost six feet in my stockings, and measure about forty inches around my shoulders, while he would probably weigh 135 lbs. and is about five and a half feet high, I am inclined to the opinion that there might hav been some fun (for me) had such an attempt been made. He did not attempt it, and has gone. The church could not support him. It shows the spirit of the whole sect toward a person who has the supreme audacity to simply presume to think for themselvs or to act contrary to the hereditary laws laid down for the unquestioned action of all humanity by the Christian church, which claims to be their protector, while ministers and priests pretend to be their spiritual advisers and guardians by special permit from on high. I claim no man as my superior, and no God my master. I am a free moral agent, with no power but my sense of right to look to for guidance or approval, and no devil to fear or shun; but when your friend Mr. Mair will sit down and locate heaven and hell according to undoubted interpretations of the Bible, locate them definitly as he would locate Lapland, Nova Zembla, Patagonia, or the more distant star in the blue vault of heaven, I may take some further notice of the prating of these Christians, who work for the almighty dollar, and for lack of it will permit all the souls of the Christian world to go down to perdition without raising their voice in the most feeble effort to save them.

Herewith find appended the names of the friends who so kindly aided me in my efforts. To each of them who are not subscribers please send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which the receipt of their subscription is acknowledged, that they may know that their money has reached its destination and that they are booked for the books. Truly yours,

D. D. LAKE.

EPHRAIM, WIS., July 1, 1881.

NORTH HURON, N. Y., Aug. 2, 1881.

TRUTH SEEKER READERS: You as well as myself hav without doubt taken a glance at the names of those who hav pledged themselvs to the trip round the world, and find some without the star prefixed, which is very unpleasant for us to behold, and much more so for him who has taken his departure with a determination to fulfil on his part or sacrifice his life in the attempt. We know the journey is long, and the labor to be performed will require every moment of time, and the mind should be free from all anxiety, and cheerfulness predominant. And how can this be accomplished? Perhaps in no better way than by the pledgers performing on their part, and in case there are those whose circumstances are such that they cannot, would it not be a good idea for those who are able to take a second share (some hav) and bestow it upon some such friend on the list, if any, and if not, out, and thus liquidate the amount pledged, and giv all a chance to read the accounts of the journey who are seeking after truths instead of superstition? Are there any willing so to do?

G. W. SMITH.

UTICA, MINN., July 25, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: At this late hour I send in my mite to help you along on your trip round the world. If you succeed in making the trip (health and strength holding out) I expect we shall hav a very rich treat served out to us in the shape of a book of travels a little ahead of anything now extant.

Wishing you health, strength, and a prosperous voyage, I remain, Yours truly, B. PEABODY.

PAXTON, ILL., June 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed is $8—$3 credit to my subscription, and the remaining $5 for the volumes you propose to write while viewing the world from the standpoint of one who has not found all truth in that bundle of absurdities, the Holy Bible.

I hav never pledged this assistance, but all the time felt that I must take a hand in this merited rebuke to Christian bigotry, arrogance, and fanaticism. But I must own my motivs to be principally selfish. I expect very much pleasure and profit from reading those volumes, and much honor from helping sustain the man who has suffered the loss of all things commonly held most dear to preserve for us and our children the blessings of liberty our fathers bequeathed to us.

I hope you will hav a congenial companion for your long and toilsome journey, and that you may enjoy the protection of the elements and the sympathy of the good and true, as you surely will of all that class who will learn the facts. L. H. IDE.

ST. JOHNS, MICH., June 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed money order to the amount of $7, which please appropriate as follows: $5 for the round-the-world trip as per agreement, $1.50 for amount due on subscription, and the balance for "The Darwins."

With earnest good wishes for you and yours during your long journey, I remain,

Yours for truth and liberty, J. D. RICHMOND.

PATERSON, N. J., July 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you that myself and wife enjoyed ourselvs ever so much at the splendid reception given you by those warm friends in New York on the eve of your departure for a long, long journey, whose duration and results can merely be guessed, not computated, but it is my most sincere wish that the most sanguin hopes of yourself and friends be more than realized, and I am anxious that your journey may be accomplished without any unpleasant encounters with wild animal of either the biped or quadruped species. I also want to ask you, if it be possible for you to do so, to find out the comparativ or actual condition of the masses in those countries you are intending to visit, especially those of Europe. I would very much like to see how your report on the earnings and cost of living of those people will compare with our consuls, given about a year ago, under the direction of the Hayes administration. I believe them cooked for a campaign document.

As I do not hardly expect to be able to come and see you off. I wish you bon voyage, and hope I shall be here to welcome you on your return. Wife joins in kindest regards to Mrs. Bennett and yourself.

Fraternally, J. WARR.

SOUTHAMPTON, ILL., July 27, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of the comparativly few of your patrons who are opposed to your trip around the world, but as you are going to take the short-cut I hope you will not suffer the hardships and privations the writer of this has experienced on a twenty-six months cruise in navigating the globe by the way of the cape of Good Hope, the East Indies, China, Southern Islands, thence to Columbia river, and down the west coasts of North and South America, around Cape Horn, up the east coast of South America, and arrived safe in the United States.

But now, after the lapse of forty-one years, I doubt that there is a vestige left of that stanch and gallant old ship, and perhaps but very few of that hardy crew that sailed her.

Well, friend Bennett, as you hav made up your mind to go I will not withhold my mite to help you along, and herewith inclose postal order for $5. May you liv and prosper in your perilous undertaking, and return safe and sound to your nativ land to gladden the hearts of your numerous friends.

Yours fraternally, JOHN G. KENDALL.

SKIDMORE, MO., July 20, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Find inclosed $5 to help you around the world, as per your agreement. I hope you will illustrate your volumes when you publish them. I did not promis to send you $5, but I presume you will accept if all the same.

Yours respectfully, N. J. SKIDMORE.

MAUSTON, WIS., July 26, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: I am no astronomer, but I hav discovered another star to help you around the world, and a truth seeker at that; be sure there is no mistake in the name and address. Here it is, D. C. Robinson, Mauston, Wis., one of our own ranks. The postmaster laughed to-day when he saw me enter the door, and said he didn't know what THE TRUTH SEEKER would do without me, I said, "Very badly indeed, sir, if I took no more interest in spreading the truth than you and many others in this town." I only liv a block from the post-office, but in that short distance I came in contact with four men, three of whom I can't persuade to hav a star attached to their names. The fourth one, Mr. J. L. Alsbacher, said, "If it was not for this old sinner there would be but little Infidelity in this town; but for him I might hav been a good Jew yet."

I said, "Never mind that, Ike; they can't cheat you out of your Jewish mark, you know."

"That's so; I didn't think of that."

At the New Jerusalem land offices they only advertise to take emigrants in at the eleventh hour, but we extend the time to half-past twelve, or any other time most convenient to all who wish to add a star to help carry D. M. Bennett around the world. I shall take all the stars I can get whether you are in New York or Egypt. Perhaps I hav said enough this time, so believe me, Yours truly, WM. HOLGATE.

WEST AMBOY, N. Y., July 24, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: A friend said, "Jen, when those books are out I wish to present them to you." I replied that I should be proud and gratified to own them eventually, but the pleasure would be greater if I knew the author had the $5 to help his trip a bit. So you may please write my name down with the happy ones, 'cause here's the money. That the pleasure will exceed anticipation, that no ill may be found insurmountable, that your return may be to peace, plenty, and consequent happiness, are the wishes of Yours truly, JENNIE LEETE.

CRAB ORCHARD, NEB., July 15, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Please find inclosed money order for $8—$5 for the world trip and $3 on subscription. Now as all hav had their say but me, I would suggest, since you hav determined to illustrate the "Tour Around the World," while at the holy city, that you hav a cut made of Absalom and his father's concubines as seen by all the people from the west side of the temple. This picture will greatly increase Comstock's admiration for you and your forthcoming book.

Yours for the advancement of truth, B. F. STONE.

COURSEN'S GROVE, KAN., July 27, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to help you round, for which please send me the book when published. I know this will be a little late, but I could not send sooner. With hopes for your safety, I am, Respectfully, C. E. COURSEN.

OREGON CO., MO., July 26, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I am an Atheist; that is, if I understand what the word means. I will tell you what I hav had to suffer on account of my opinion. I am a showman, and often express my opinion regarding religious belief. Not long ago I was at one of their meetings, at a country schoolhouse, to advertise my show. A man stepped up to me and asked my name. I told him. Another man who happened to see us got a writ for us, and the cost of the suit took every cent I had. I am in the most distressed circumstances, having a wife and three children to support, and having had to spend over $15 for medicin in the last ten months. The cause of the arrest was for being an Atheist. I hav fifteen or twenty copies of your paper—the best paper published.

Now, Mr. Bennett, I want to work for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the pulling down of institutions that take away our liberty. I get no assistance from them, therefore I now make an appeal to a few of the Liberals of New York city. If they could send me a few dollars I would be very glad, as I am chilling and hav not a cent with which to obtain provisions to eat. I could write one hundred pages telling of the crimes done against Infidels, but I must stop. If I can't get help from my friends shall never make another effort in that direction as long as I liv. In sending money, address O. S. Ware, Payne post-office, Oregon Co., Mo.

Your friend, O. S. WARE.

ROSEVILLE, July 12, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: A postal card and four copies of your superb journal came to hand last week. The card was on a business matter; the four papers are brimful of the gospel of common sense, truth, and progress. It is so encouraging to learn that the glorious work is still progressing. In spite of the nasty methods, hypocrisy, bigotry, and intolerance, larger and larger numbers of heroic souls are gathering under our banner. The athlete Reason is challenging to mortal combat the monsters of superstition everywhere. The bloody hands of the church are still convulsivly clutching at Freedom's white throat. But so many of her strong fortresses hav been stormed and demolished, so many of her horrid dogmas hav been exploded by the divine torch of reason, that her power to terrify is splendidly less.

I must admit, while I agree with your contributor, Redfield, that we hav enough for all the Ingersolls and Bennetts to do in showing up this priest-ridden country, I think your contemplated journey round the world is a splendid idea. Many men hav gone round the world before; some of them, no doubt, were competent to hav done much that you propose to do; but the mailed hand of the church was upon their mouths; compelling them to suppress truths of vast importance, or blinding their eyes so that they did not see. I trust you will name your first volume of travels "The First Free Man that Journeyed Round the World." Receive my blessings and hopeful good wishes. Of course you will hav the benefit of the earnest prayers of the church to the effect that the Lord will feed some great fish with the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Hav you spiked all of Mr. Mair's ? If not, why does he dodge all vital points in the discussion? The thought has occurred to me that the truth has dawned upon his brain and that he will be ready to argue for the other side soon. Hopefully,

T. R. STEPHENSON.

GURNEE, ILL., June 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been waiting and watching all the rest to see them expose their minds about your little tramp around this small planet. Well, find inclosed $11—$5 for the world trip, $3 on subscription, and $3 for two copies of your travels in Europe, one for friend Fankel, and one for myself.

Yours for the right always, T. V. LAWSON.

VINTON, IOWA, July 26, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find draft for three dollars, and apply the same to account for TRUTH SEEKER. I can't well do without your paper at this time, as I expect to be much interested in your letters while you are on your round-the-world trip. May good health and an abundance of pleasure attend you on your long journey. I might pray for your safe return, but I hav learned that it is a waste of time and attended with bad results, as the Christian God never fulfils his promis to answer prayers. So men who are believers in that kind of a God naturally follow his example and learn to disregard their own obligations by the precedent set for them by their God. Yours in the hope of the triumph of truth, N. HAYS.

VOSBURGH, KAN., June 3, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: As I was lately eating my humble meal of pork and beans I looked over your fourteenth letter to Mr. Mair, thus taking both bodily and mental food at the same time, both of which I considered very nourishing. My private opinion may be a little premature, as your discussion is not yet ended, but I calculated that a few more such broadsides of yours, properly distributed, would spoil all the theology in the world. Taking Mr. Mair as an individual I am inclined to think that a cold rag on his forehead, with a pair of mustard poultices on his feet, would feel very comfortable, and be quite beneficial, and taking him as one of a large class the necessity stares out of many hospitals for such patients to be solely presided over by the leading Infidels of the age, so that such subjects would receive proper treatment. We find a good many of these benighted unfortunates over the frontier of Kansas, where little moving around and changing of locations has a tendency generally to brighten up some people. When we look at these people and contrast them with honest Infidels we are surprised what ignorance and darkness are still in our midst. It is indeed strange that the Lord allows these good Christian people to suffer so in common with the ungodly during unfavorable seasons. At such times they gladly accept aid from Infidels or anybody else, for they know well that it is not safe to trust to the Lord to rain down manna or quails on toast when needed. Their faith is indeed weak and faltering. We hav been blessed so far with an unusually favorable spring. We are now correcting God's works by increasing the area of cultivation for the purpose of producing a larger rain-fall. As during the dry seasons of the past two years no amount of prayer would bring rain, I think there must be a screw loose in the orthodox machine somewhere, or things would come better to time I think we had better deputize some Henry Ward Beecher or Mr. Mair, both of whom are no doubt well acquainted with such machinery, to visit the upper regions armed with different-sized monkey-wrenches and tighten up things, or we shall stand in great danger of getting drowned out this season on the American desert.

Yours for truth, justice, and the welfare of THE TRUTH SEEKER, J. B. W.

DETROIT, MICH., July 26, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I see that you are on the eve of departure for your trip around the world, and if I am in time to avail myself of the eleventh-hour dodge, I want to take it in, so inclosed please find $8, $3 of which is for the continuation of the paper, which I hav taken from the first copy published down to the last, and the remaining $5 is to help you on your trip. Please hav a care as you pass through some of those God-haunted and devil-infested regions that you are not taken to some exceedingly high mountain and there shown and proffered all the kingdoms of the world to sell out, or that the same old spanking team with a fiery chariot, that was sent down for good old Elijah, may not be in waiting to bear you away to join him safe in the promised land. This would not do, as we should all be left to mourn your loss. And if you shall chance to pass through the land of Uz, and any of the descendants of the sons of God are still living in that section of country who, in company with their father and the devil (people are known by the company they keep), used to afflict (for their Sunday amusement) poor old Job with sore boils from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, and you should happen by a strange fatality to be smitten in a similar way, please don't lay your misfortunes to the devil, and then afterward, stupidly and in an unguarded moment, cry out as Job did (and thus let the cat out of the bag), and declare that you were suffering for the sins of your youth. No, don't do this, as it would look suspicious in these latter days of "petroleum" wealth prosperity and fast living. Job lived in an oil country, and was probably a "coal-oil Jonnie." But especially please don't wear your hair long, as some fair Delilah might persuade you to indulge in a sweet siesta, from the strange, voluptuous dreams of which you might awake only to find yourself a modern Sampson shorn of your locks, your strength gone, and betrayed into the hands of some Anthony Comstock Philistine, your eyes scratched out, and you left in a worse condition than when incarcerated in Ludlow-Street Jail or pining in Albany's prison cells. And if at any time in your travels you should find yourself tired, weary, and footsore, as was the Lord when visiting Abraham on the plains of Mamre, don't get into any wrangling disputes with some old Sarah, even if she should indulge in immoderate and incredulous laughter at the idea of bearing a child when old and well stricken in years. No, let the old lady hav her way about it, and don't giv yourself away by placing yourself at the mercy of old Sarah's enemies. I should not advise you to visit Sodom and Gomorrah, for there might be some of the descendants of Lot's daughters still living in that vicinity; and there might also still be a case of that same old wine left which those two virtuous girls lugged off in their hasty flight, and with which they played such funny pranks with their old father two nights in succession, the two girls drawing cuts to see who should enjoy the fun of getting the old man drunk the first night. No, I should giv Sodom and Gomorrah a wide berth. If you should happen to meet in that country a fair damsel who can trace her pedigree back to those two daughters of Lot, flee for your life! Look not behind you! And as for that kind of wine, touch not, taste not, handle not the mischievous stuff.

You might, while lingering at the little city of Zoar, hav an eye to the pillar of salt into which Lot's wife was so suddenly changed because the poor old lady turned to view for the last her home and loved ones left behind. They say that Lot's wife has become a mountain of salt some five miles in length, with proportionate hight and symmetrical form. This was intimated by Dr. Adam Clark in his travels in search of the remains of that saline fossil. Should this prove to be the case, you might take a lease on her, and upon your return we could organize a stock company on her, with a capital stock of say $200,000,000, and thus get a corner on salt. We might appropriate one-half to foreign and home missions, and thus secure the influence of the clergy. There may be millions in it. A block of the stock might be sold to Colonel Sellers.

By the way, speaking of speculations, I hav another suggestion to make. Should you in your perambulations round the world in search of truth and Bible curiosities chance to fall in with any of that genus or species of the human female bipeds who used to hav devils cast out of them—sometimes as many as seven at a birth—I wish you would secure one and ship him to me via the Suez Canal, thence by express the overland route. Chain him firm and strong, and don't let the lubber hav too long a chain so that he can "go about" the cage "like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour," and thereby increase the expenses by making it necessary to employ an army of priestly keepers to protect the industrious and otherwise innocently employed people from the destructions, for which the clergy say those devils hav a strong penchant, if they don't divide their hard earnings and giv liberally for the support of the church. I think, perhaps, we could make a grand speculation out of this by selling him to Mr. Barnum. Such a young devil would beat his famous "what-is-it" all to peices. And if we found it to be a paying enterprise we could doubtless by contributing a portion of the proceeds to the cause of Christ and the support of the church go in with the Young Men's Christian Association, and, by employing Comstock as manager, could do an immense business, besides increasing the number of devils. Please send one of the prolific sort, one of the Mary Magdalene kind. Should we contemplate the securing of Comstock as manager, y might send one of each sex, as he could train the female (if as successful as he has been in one case) to stand on her head and perform sundry tricks, all of which would be amusing both to the young as well as the older members of the Young Men's Christian Association. I think, furthermore, it would be an excellent thing, aside from its speculativ character, to bring one or two oriental devils to this country. I think it would be a means of greatly improving the Comstock "strain" by the cross if Anthony should become manager of the concern. It might deteriorate the devils some, but this would be more than compensated by the gain on the other side. And then, from a moral and religious standpoint, I think the introduction into this country of those young devils would soon be the means of bringing all devils up to the standard of our Christian civilization. You see, according to the new revision (and they hav got it right this time sure), that hell is no longer hell, but "hades," and hades, you know, means hades. And if there is no longer a hell, why, the very devils themselvs would soon become mild, gentle, and peaceful, for as mercy would take the place of revenge, and angry threatenings giv way to persuasiv love, even the devils themselvs would learn to become amiable and kind. And thus would the "Anthony" stock come to be improved. One thing more: should you in your travels accidentally stumble upon and find the last resting-place of our dear old ancestors, Adam and Eve, I wish you would drop a tear for me on the latter, for if it had not been for that "brave little wife" of Adam we might all hav been a pack of priest-ridden, blubbering idiots.

Again, I say, in conclusion, seriously, hav a care to the many dangers that will lurk in your pathway. It is sad to think that you, like a good old saint of former times (Paul), will be exposed to dangers "by sea and by land." Our hearts will yearn for your safety and our love sigh for your return. Good-bye.

Yours fraternally, U. K. BOOTH.

NORTH STAR, July 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find a postal order to apply on my subscription, and 25 cents for "Self-Contradictions of the Bible." I regret much I am unable to subscribe to help you on your round-the-world trip, for I shall want the books. If I ever get the money to spare I shall try to get them, and I want your "Infidel Abroad," and I shall want your "Bennett-Mair Discussion." I hav been very much interested in reading it, and want the book to loan to my orthodox friends. I should feel lost without THE TRUTH SEEKER to read. I shall try to send you some more money as soon as I can get it. As long as it is possible for me to pay for it I shall take it, and when I can't pay for it any longer I will let you know. Hoping you may hav a pleasant and profitable journey, I remain, ISAAC GABRION.

KIOWA, KAN., June 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. If I had the money to spare I should hav sent you a "V" long before now, and it would hav said go or stay, as you thought best, but in my heart I wished you would conclude not to go, for I could not help but think how lonely Mrs. Bennett would be without you, and then the thought that you might get sick in a strange land with no loved one to care for you was another reason for wishing you not to go; but I hav all confidence n Mr. Macdonald and Mrs. Bennett, and think the paper will be all right. It has become one of the necessities with us. The discussion between Mr. Bennett and Mr. Mair is very interesting. If I had ever had any reverence for the Bible God there would be none left after reading Mr. Bennett's letters. I can't help but think Mr. Mair must belong to that class that are blind because they will not see. I shall try to get the book when it is published.

With many wishes for you a pleasant journey and safe return, I am, as ever, LOTTIE E. GRIFFIN.

A Wild Fancy.

If the sad old world should jump a cog
Some time, in its dizzy spinning.
And go off the track with a sudden jog.
What an end would come to the sinning!
What a rest from strife and the burdens of life
For the millions of people in it;
Why, a way out of care, and worry and wear,
And all in a beautiful minute.

With not a sigh or a sad good-bye
For loved ones left behind us,
We would go with a lunge and a mighty plunge
Where never a grave should find us.
What a wild, mad thrill our veins would fill,
As the great earth, like a feather,
Should float through the air to God knows where
And carry us all together.

No dark, damp tomb, and no mourners' gloom,
No tolling bell in the steeple,
But in one swift breath a painless death,
For a million billion people.
What greater bliss could we wish than this,
To sweep with a bird's free motion
Through leagues of space to a resting-place
In a vast and vapory ocean—
To pass away from this life for aye,
With never a dear tie sundered,
And a world on fire for our funeral pyre,
While the stars looked on and wondered!

Impromptu Response

TO AN INVITATION TO WRITE A FEW WORDS TO A LIBERAL CONVENTION IN VINELAND, N. J.

BY C. FANNIE ALLYN.

A Liberal Convention? Well now, that is good;
But do you suppose that the word's understood?
Do you think in this age of transition to thought
From the ignorant faith that our ancestors taught,
That women and men can be Liberal in deed,
And can follow the truth where'er it may lead?

A good Baptist is made by immersion, sans soap;
An Episcopal's faith is engendered from hope;
Presbyterians come by election's blest spell;
And a Methodist born thro' the fear of a hell;
Universalists—faith in a Christ that can save;
And a Spiritist grows by a note from the grave.

'Tis not hard to be all that the church may require,
Or to the communion of angels aspire;
'Tis a matter of evidence brought to each one,
And beliefs are but sequences when this is done,
For that which appeals to each one's highest light
Brings the knowledge, or faith, each soul must think right.

But a Liberal—ah! friends, that is harder indeed
To learn how to think, minus church, priest, and creed,
To allow to all others the rights we demand,
To all sects extending the courteous hand,
Being just to our enemies, finding in all
Some traces of goodness we like to recall.

To engage against sin, leaving sinners alone,
Giving gossips starvation, by casting no stone,
Remembering at all times that prenatal life
Has fashioned our actions with joy or with strife
And feel that the same power of darkness or grace
Would be ours were we but in the other one's place;

To enthrone some high truth, though the mass by our side
E'en our manner and method may scorn and deride,
To face ev'ry fact though our idols go down,
To be ready to study from book, beast, or clown,
And admit we are pupils in life's busy throng,
And we may make mistakes though we want not the wrong.

Are we liberal enough to work without thanks,
Taking just as much stock in our truths as our banks?
Are we liberal enough no advantage to take
When a tiny white fib would a gain for us make?
To stand for the right though we're hissed by the throng,
And not even take friendship if based on a wrong?
Are we liberal enough to forego present gain
That the future shall grow from our sorrow and pain?

Are we self-sacrificing with all our pretense,
Or is it a matter of dollars and cents?
Is our money as free as our words for the right,
Or are sentences easy and pocket-books tight?
Can we giv to the cause without hope of reward,
Or do we ask pay when we "lend to the Lord?"

It is much to be Liberal—I doubt if we are;
But we're surely advancing 'neath reason's bright star;
It is hard to begin with ourselvs to reform,
When the effort produces a fierce mental storm;
It is easy applauding the lessons we teach,
But hard to be liberal and act what we preach.

Let us onward and upward and forward for truth,
We can learn from the sire, we can study from youth;
From the gods and the demons, from heaven and hell,
From all nature around and within us as well,
Till we take a high rank for wisdom in fight,
And "a Liberal's" a title for justice and right.

Then here's health to my friends who in fancy I see,
And the same to my foes (though they may not agree);
I am with you in spirit though miles stretch between,
And I wish that my form in your midst could be seen.
May the angels both sides of the gateway of death
Baptize you with love in each instant of breath.

May your sessions be pleasant, your motivs be pure,
That freedom of thought may be still more secure;
Till pulpit and rostrum and ballot-box tell
That the Liberal element does its work well;
Till fathers and mothers more truthful shall stand
And home life and children grow holy and grand.

May your meeting and parting be earnest and true,
And the flowers of fraternity blossom anew.
As no truth can be canceled, no error last long
Where the children of liberty daily grow strong.
Let us work till humanity's beauty is rife
And nations are lifted from ignorant strife,
And we pass to the endless convention of life.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE,

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusively that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last" I have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kingel's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.
Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet today what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.
Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

[Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.]

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfulls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.
Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.
Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.
Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.
Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.
Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,
MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism. I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.
I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays (but had no faith in them), with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a better appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel better, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,
MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength. I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.
I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apopiexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.
Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no pheuomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.
Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain. Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."
I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as YOU DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.
God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.
Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME.

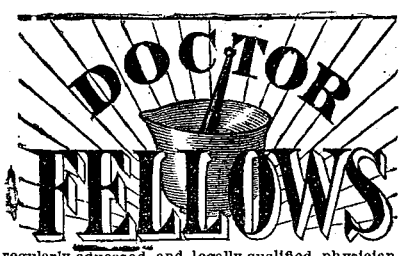
FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN.

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.
I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.



All forms of PULMONARY DISEASE, such as Phthisis Pulmonalis, or Consumption, Bronchial Hemorrhage, Pulmonary Hemorrhage, Croupous Pneumonia, Catarrhal Pneumonia, Induration, or Hardening of the Lung, Bronchial Asthma, Tussis Convulsiver, or Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Pleura, or Pleurisy, Hydro-Thorax, or Water in the Chest, Pneumo-Thorax, or Air in the Chest, Epitaxis, or Bleeding from the Nose.
The above forms of disease require "Wilsonia" Magnetic suits which aggregate in cost from $38.50 to $73.50, according to the precise character of the disease and condition of the patient. These same conditions govern or determin the quantity of goods and their aggregate cost in every case mentioned in the following classes:
All forms of Cardiac, or HEART DISEASE, require magnetic suits ranging in price from $38.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of DIGESTION, such as Diphtheritic Inflammation of the Pharynx, Syphilitic Affections of the Pharynx, Inflammation of the Œsophagus, Stricture of the Œsophagus, Acute Gastric Catarrh, or Acute Catarrh of the Stomach, Gastritis, or Inflammation of the Stomach, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Stomach, Hematomesis, or Hemorrhage of the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Scrofulous and Tuberculous Diseases of the Intestins and Mesenteric Glands, Colic, Gastric Fever, Neuralgia of the Stomach and Intestins, Peritonitis.
The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $93.50.

The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $88 50.
All forms of disease of the kidneys, such as Hemorrhage of the Kidneys, Acute Bright's Disease, Parenchymatous, or Chronic Bright's Disease, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Kidneys, Renal Calculus, or Stones in the Kidneys, Hematuria Vesicalis, or Hemorrhage of the Bladder, Incontinence of Urine and all diseases of the Sexual organs, Ovaritis, or Inflammation of the Ovary, Ovarian Tumor, Catarrh of the Uterus, Displacement of the Uterus, Parenchymatous Metritis, or Acute Inflammation of the Uterus, Tumors of the Uterus, Anomalis, or Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Catarrh of the Vagina, Leucharrh.
The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $108.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the NERVOUS SYSTEM, such as Softening of the Brain, Hemaphlega, or Paralysis of the Lateral Halves of the Body, Pariphlegia, or Paralysis of the Upper or Lower Half of the Body, Paralysis Agitans, or Shaking Palsy, Apoplexy, Cerebral Hemorrhage, Cerebritis, or Inflamation of the Brain, Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis, Sclerosis of the Brain, Hydrocephalus Acquisitus, or Water on the Brain Acquired. Hydrocephalus Congenitus, or Water on the Brain from Birth, Myelitis, or Inflammation of the Spinal Marrow, Hemorrhage of the Spinal Cord, or Spinal Apoplexy, Tabes Dorsualis, or Consumption of the Spinal Cord, Locomotor Ataxia, or Progressiv Grey Degeneration of the Posterior Columns of the Spinal Cord, Tic douloureux, Neuralgia, Neuralgia Ischia Dica, or Sciatica, Chorea, or St. Vitus' Dance, Trismus, or Lock-jaw, Epilepsy, or Falling Sickness, Eclampsia Infantum, Hysteria, Catalepsy, Hypochoudriasis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $150.00.
All forms of DISEASE of the SKIN, such as Eczema and its several varieties, require suits costing from $48 50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of LOCOMOTION, such as Rheumarthrisis Acute, or Flying Gout Acute Articular Rheumatism, Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Deformities of the Joints, Gout, Progressiv Muscular Atrophy.
The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $300.00.
All forms of ACUTE and CHRONIC INFECTIOUS DISEASE, such as Measles, Scarlet Fever, Small Pox, Chicken Pox, Typhus Fever, Typhoid Fever, Relapsing Fever, Intermittent Fever, Dysentery, Syphilis, Congental and Heredltary.
The above require magnetic suits costing $93.00.
All DISORDERS OF NUTRITION which do not depend upon Infection, such as Chlorisis, Scrofula, Diabetes [both varieties], Scarbutus, or Scurvy, etc.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $68.50.
HERNIA requires Magnetic Appliances costing from $53.50 to $93.50.
VARICOSE VEINS require Magnetic Appliances costing from $58.50 to $108.50.

N. B.—When "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits are ordered to be forwarded by mail or express [they should go by express wherever practicable], do not neglect to state the size of head, of the waist, the wrist, and length of the foot of the person for whom they are ordered. All checks and post-office orders should be made payable to William Wilson, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physica Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complain in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Gems of Thought.

No real Infidel ever fears death. Why should we? It is like the day's close when its labors are ended, the calm lying down to sleep and leaving of the morrow to its own destinies. If we wake we take up the duties and pleasures of the new day, and if we never wake it is forever an endless blank, and why need we dread that when it is really (for us) nothingness and annihilation?—Elmina D. Slenker.

EVERY miracle and preternatural event that is taught against the consent of reason is a dark cloud between the hearts of men and the sunlight of truth. While men refuse to trust their senses, to be guided by reason, or continue to hold any fact or truth of nature as profane, the wheels of progress will be blocked, the hopes of humanity unfulfilled, and its truest joy and peace unrealized. No instrumentality or agency should be neglected in dethroning supernaturalism and enthroning nature. Much has been accomplished, but much more remains to be done.—George Chainey's Iconoclasm.

A SPIRITUALIST [N. B.—No reference is intended to our table-rapping friends!] who tries to eradicate worldliness by teaching what you will get in another world for your virtue cannot succeed. Selfishness does but become more long-sighted. Greek philosophers taught that virtue was to be loved for her own sake; that no reward was desired by the virtuous man but virtue herself; that to do a good deed was not goodness unless it were done from the love of goodness. The good man necessarily rejoices in good acts, whoever performs them. Being delightful, to him, they are an end in themselvs, and not a mere means to something beyond; though they generally do lead to further desirable results. Thus virtue did not need happiness or reward as "an appendage," but had the happiness and reward in herself.—F. W. Newman.

I KNOW there is truth opposit to falsehood, that it may be found if people will [seek it], and is worth the seeking, and is not only the most valuable but the pleasantest thing in the world. And therefore I am no more troubled and disturbed with all the dust that is raised against it than I should be to see from the top of a high steeple, where I had clear air and sunshine, a company of great boys or little boys (for 'tis all one) throw up dust in the air which reached not me, but fell down in their own eyes.—Locke's Familiar Letters.

FIGS, as you see and know,
Do not of thistles grow;
And though the blossoms blow
While on the tree,
Grapes never, never yet
On limbs of thorns were set;
So if you good would get,
Good you must be.
Life's journey through and through
Speak what is just and true,
Do what is right to do
To one and all. —E. D. Slenker.

ALL the churches in the time of Wesley adhered to forms of belief to which, since the floodgates of new knowledge, scientific, historical, and critical, hav been opened, no man of competent learning can adhere without doing despite the light which is in him, and which it is to be presumed comes from the universal source of light. The churches hav to look in the face the question whether that which reason by conscientious effort has discovered does or does not emanate from the author of truth. If it does, they hav to accept it, even though it may not square with their former lives and the past history of their doctrins. If it does not, they hav to show us on what, if not reason, the evidences of Christianity rests.—Toronto Bystander.

IT is ridiculous in any man to say in general that your book [Locke's Inquiry into the Human Understanding] is dangerous. Let any fair contender for truth sit down and show wherein 'tis erroneous. Dangerous is a word of uncertain significance; every one uses it in his own sense. A papist shall say 'tis dangerous because perhaps it agrees not so well with transubstantiation; and a Lutheran because his consubstantiation is in hazard; but neither consider whether transubstantiation or consubstantiation be true or false, but taking it for granted that they are true, or at least gainful, whatever hits it, or is against it, must be dangerous.—Molyneux in Locke's Familiar Letters.

MAN has learned in the school of experience what produces his happiness and what diminishes his enjoyment. The one he calls good, the other evil; the one right, the other wrong. He has learned that certain actions, although they may giv him temporary pleasure, are followed by lasting injury to himself or his friends. These the thoughtful man avoids equally with those which are attended or followed by unmixed suffering. He has learned that other actions, although they cause him pain, or conflict with his immediate interest, result in greater happiness to himself and others than would be possible if they were shunned. These the man of moral courage performs equally with those good deeds which require no nerve nor moral courage to perform.—B. F. Underwood.

EVERY Theist must admit that if God exists he could hav so convinced all men of the fact of his existence that doubt, disagreement, or disbelief would be impossible. If he could not do this, he would not be omnipotent or he would not be omniscient; that is, he would not be God. Every Theist must also agree that if God exists he would wish all men to hav such a clear consciousness of his existence and attributes that doubt, disagreement, or disbelief on the subject would be impossible. And this, if for no other reason, because that out of doubts and disagreements in religion hav too often resulted centuries of persecution, strife, and misery which a good God would desire to prevent. But as many men hav doubts, as a large majority of mankind hav disagreements, and as some hav disbeliefs as to God's existence and attributes, it follows either that God does not exist or that he is not all-wise, or that he is not all-powerful, or that he is not all-good.—Bradlaugh.

Odds and Ends.

THE SORROWS OF GENIUS.

Homer was a beggar.
Spencer died in want.
Cervantes died in hunger.
Terrence, the dramatist, was a slave.
Dryden lived in poverty and distress.
Sir Walter Raleigh died on the scaffold.
Butler lived a life of penury and died poor.
Bacon lived a life of meanness and distress.
Plutus, the Roman comic poet, turned a mill.
Paul Borghese had fourteen trades, and yet starved with all.
Tasso, the Italian poet, was often distressed for five shillings.
Steele, the humorist, lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs.
Otway, the English dramatist, died prematurely, and through hunger.
Chattetson, the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself at eighteen.
Bentivoglio was refused admittance into a hospital he had himself erected.
The death of Collins was through neglect, first causing mental derangement.
Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for the debt of forty dollars.
Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" was sold for a trifle, to save him from the grip of he law.
Milton sold his copyright of "Paradise Lost" for seventy-five dollars, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity.

NAUGHTY, BUT SWEET.

Somebody's lips were close to mine;
Thus tempted I couldn't resist.
Roguish and rosy, a sweet little mouth
Was suddenly, softly kissed.
Somebody's eyes looked up and frowned
With such a reproving glance;
"If kisses were wicked," I asked my pet,
Then the eyes began to dance.
And smiling, the little maid answered,
As I knelt there at her feet,
"They must be a little bit naughty,
Or they never would be so sweet."

ENDIN' UP THE WORLD.

"Dem Africans up dar in Kaintuck has done got me all broke up," said the old man as he stood his brush up on end and leaned against the rear wall of the market.

"What's the trouble?"

"'Bout de endin' ob de world, sah. Some of 'em said de gran' splash would take place last week, an' some of 'em say it has been put off till de twentieth, an' some of 'em are gwiue to prepar' to go up nex' Saturday. When I leff de house dis mawnin' I tole de ole woman I war gwine to ax some white man all about it an' git right down to de dead level. Now, sah, what am do cold facks in de case? Am de world gwine to kerplash dis summer or not?"

"Of course not."

"Dat's 'zackly what I tole 'em up dar. She can't do it. She can't afford it. Why sah, if de world should bust up what would become of all de folks?"

"That's true."

"Yes sah, an' whar would de pieces go to? Why dar wouldn't be room for de splinters, let alone de big chunks. De ole woman may sot up all night waitin' to ha'ar de fust crash, but she'll be disappinted. Ye havn't smelt brimstun, hav ye?"

"No."

"Nor I either; but dem Kaintuck lunatics am snufflin' an' cryin' out de world am all on fiah. How long, sah, do you spec' dis world will stan?"

"Oh, about ten million years more."

"Honest?"

"Yes."

"Den I guess I'll walk up home an' tell de ole woman. One reason why she feels so bad is bekase she was gwine down to Toronto dis fall to see her sister, an' she thought de endin up ob de world might stop de railroad kyars from runnin.' Ten millyon y'ars mo'! Why, she'll hav time to finish dat log-cabin bed-quilt an' visit her sister too."

REVISION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

We hear a great many remarks made on this subject, and all sorts of opinions given, but perhaps Uncle John's opinion is about as near right as any of them. Coming into town the other day Uncle John was asked by one of our prominent citizens what he thought of the revision.

"Well, Squire, I think it's a d—d swindle. You know, Squire, I make free use of Bible words in my family; not that I always use the same words that the parson does, but they're Bible words all the same, and we always got along well enough till this new version come out."

"What is wrong about the new version, Uncle John?"

"Well, Squire, I'll tell you. When I tell my boy Jim to do anything and he don't start as soon as I want him to, I just sing out, 'Jim, what in h—l and damnation is the reason you don't start?' He starts then, you bet. And when I go into the house tired and hungry and ask the old woman if dinner is ready, and she says no, I ask her what in h—l is the reason. You can just bet your boots I don't hav to wait long for dinner. And there's my horses, too. When I get a big load on and they don't want to pull I just sing out, 'What in hell and damnation are you doing here?' and that load moves or they go through the harness. But now here it is, when I tell my boy to do a thing and he don't, I sing out, 'Why in hades and condemnation don't you start?' but do you think he starts? Not a bit of it. He jest sets there and laughs, and says, 'Old man, you must be getting luny.' And when I ask the old woman what in hades is the reason dinner aint ready she looks sorter wild and then says, 'Jim, your father has got another of them bad spells, and I guess you'd better go for the doctor.' And the horses—they won't know a thing I mean when I sing out 'hades and condemnation.' No, sir, they'd stand there from now till the judgment day afore they'd start a peg for such d—d nonsense. No, Squire, that new version of the Testament don't work worth a d—n in our family."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 34. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, August 20, 1881 | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Herald says that the American Bible Society last month supplied 3,400 destitute families with the sacred book. Would it not hav been better to supply them with bread?

THE Rev. Geo. W. Williams, a member of the Ohio Legislature, is a negro. A year ago he was suing a Columbus hotel for refusing to board him on account of his color. Now a Columbus hotel-keeper is suing Williams for failing to pay a board bill.

REV. SILAS PIERSON, a Baptist preacher, residing and preaching near Greenup, Illinois, recently eloped with a seventeen-year-old daughter of a member of his flock. Her name is Alice Maynes, and she is said to be very handsome. The fleeing minister leaves a wife and three children.

ONE of the Roman Catholic members of the House of Commons, who not only voted and spoke against Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to take his seat, but in addition gleefully boasted that his seat would be vacated by his being made bankrupt for penalties, was recently himself adjudicated bankrupt.

LAPHAM'S PEAK is the highest in Wisconsin. It has another name, Holy Hill, and another distinction on account of the miracles said to be wrought there in answer to prayer. The cures claimed are marvelous indeed, ranging from the instantaneous mending of broken legs to the recovery of consumptivs whom physicians had given up to die. The praying is done by Methodists. They claim to hav saved Mr. Garfield.

CAPT. AMOS SHIRLEY, the leader of the Salvation Army, which flourished and then collapsed in this city a short time since, has disappeared, leaving behind a very unsavory reputation. For some time past Mrs. Shirley has been accusing her husband of Infidelity, and that her accusations are true has been clearly established, as well as the additional fact that Shirley has been peculating from the treasury of the army. Shirley's affinity is said to be a wealthy young woman who was converted by his gifted eloquence. Saturday Mrs. Shirley and her daughter sailed for Europe, leaving the missing husband liberty to practice dishonesty, deception, and religion in glorious but gullible America.

THE London Liberator says: "The poverty of the poor clergy would be hard to bear in any case, but what must be the feelings of a poor curate when he hears of such a living as that of Wimbush, Essex, the net income of which is £650 a year, while 'no duty whatever' is required from the holder? It has been a sinecure for more than four hundred years, and for the most part has been bought by women for family purposes. It is also a donative—i.e., the right to present is absolute, and any clergyman, whatever his character, can be presented 'in spite of all the bishops of England.' This living was lately put up at auction, and, not being sold, the price is reduced from £6,200 to £5,500. It is an investment simply—we cannot say pure and simply."

JOHN SHEPPARD, an Infidel, of Orion, Neb., built a platform alongside a Methodist camp-meeting ground, and made daily speeches against the doctrins preached by the Methodist ministers. He was a great annoyance to the Christians, and they tried hard to convert him, but all in vain. One day an impulsiv clergyman prayed that, if Sheppard could be silenced in no other way, he might be removed by death. That evening the Infidel died very suddenly, and it would be difficult to convince the people thereabout that he was not killed in direct answer to prayer.—N. Y. Church Union. Either this story is a lie, or the Christians must hav poisoned Mr. Sheppard. We incline to the former opinion, as it is very easy for Christians to deviate from the strict truth, while but few of them hav the courage, although the most of them hav the will, to poison a man. It is not perfectly safe to kill even heretics now.

THE Rev. James A. Corcoran has the common sense to see and say that "Ingersoll is really logical, and has the best of the argument on the Protestant side. He is carrying out the Protestant principle to its legitimate deductions. If Protestants attack the Catholic church they use his principles; if they want to answer him they fall back on ours. They are utterly irrational. They hav started him on his course, and then tell him to halt midway. Why should he listen to them, or obey their dictation? Are they infallible guides of the human mind, after teaching their followers that neither Christ's church nor any power on earth can prescribe limits to the liberty that Christ has left to his followers? Ingersoll only follows out their rule in explaining scripture by his private spirit against Christianity or against the arbitrary limits these men hav prescribed."

As an example of how the first report of a calamity always makes an impression on the minds of the people that subsequent corrected information never fully eradicates, is the fact that the general impression still prevails that the two shots fired at the President by Guiteau both entered his body. Whereas, while one ball entered the back of his right side, between the hip and kidney, the other passed through the right coat-sleeve just below the shoulder. Another incident of this tragedy that received little notice was the almost involuntary though none the less noble and devoted action of Col. Robert Ingersoll, who was present in the ladies' room of the Potomac depot at the time of the shooting, and heard the shots fired. Not being near enough to the assassin to stay his hand, he sprang forward and covered the wounded President with his body, facing Guiteau, who still held the revolver in his hand.—Church Unio .

DEAN STANLEY has been buried in Westminster Abbey. He refused George Eliot a resting-place there. Now, compare the good these two hav done. What did Dean Stanley ever do for humanity, or for anybody but himself? He was not even a Christian, for he did not believe in the supernatural history of Jesus Christ. He was a favorit with royalty, popular with dissenters, as his religion was liberal, and he was of that wing of the English church called "Broad." He did not object to George Eliot's (Marian Evans) creed, but because she was not married by a clergyman to Lewes, the historian, with whom she lived, therefore she was not good enough to repose by the side of the particularly immaculate lords, scholars, and virtuous dames that sleep in Westminster. No doubt but that the bones of those peculiarly moral king Georges would hav rattled with indignation had the casket that enshrined the genius of poor Marian Evans been laid beside them. How about Peg Woffington, as noted for her infidelities to her lovers as for her histrionic ability; what is she doing in Westminster Abbey?—Mayflower.

THE price of prepared lithographed sermons in Chicago has gone down to thirty cents a sermon. The temptation is great to lazy ministers. When for this inconsequential sum a pastor can save himself several hours' work, and can at the same time feed his people on better material than he could himself prepare, it is hardly human to resist such a chance to do good at small expense. Thus far the enterprising Chicago publisher which furnishes the sermonic lithographs has several hundred discourses on miscellaneous topics, avoiding controversy and sectarianism. As the list increases, the brethren who purchase will hav to look with care into the doctrins of the discourses they select. This kind of business may do in England, where ministers are expected to be more perfunctory in the performance of their duty, and hearers less on the alert. If it goes on to any great extent in this country there will be some awful developmen by quick-witted hearers, followed by exposures, and church-trials, and heart-rending alienations, and all that sort of thing.

AN Oregon paper has this in a recent issue: "A long letter appears in the Mercury of Sunday last, charging Professor Walker, President of the college at Philomath and a minister of the gospel, with being a libertin and a liar. It is signed by Isaac Belknap, ex-pastor of the church at Philomath, and a member of twenty-one years' standing, and concludes with the following appeal to Professor Walker: 'SIR: I charge you of circulating among your friends reports that are as false as your own heart, and thereby trying to break down the character of the innocents whom you had previously sought to ruin. These and all the foregoing charges are of such a nature that no honest gentleman will rest under them, and I hav but to add that if you think your past record will bear inspection and wish to enter into a legal investigation of the matter, you will find me in life-size at my residence at Philomath.

'Then giv no longer private lessons
To a female class of one,
In the chapel of the college,
'Neath the setting of the sun.'"

MARY DUNN, the blind Philadelphia girl, who professes to hav had visions of the Virgin Mary, adheres to her claim of that special favor. She wished an altar erected in her bedroom, and at midnight, under her direction, several persons knelt and recited the litany of the Blessed Virgin. "Mary lay in bed," says one of these witnesses, and all of them agree in the account, "a lighted candle in her left hand, and with her right she was pointing toward a certain spot in the wall just over her bedside, and saying, 'There it is; just there. Don't you see it?' I looked in the direction which she indicated, and there, upon the wall, just as plain as if it were painted, I saw the picture of the Blessed Virgin Mary. I stayed there two hours, and all the while the picture remained upon the wall. It was just as we see it in the paintings, with a sweet, demure face, and great mournful eyes. There was a halo about the head, and a strange but distinct light. All the while the blind child seemed to be filled with unutterable joy. I thought she would hav spasms. She prayed fervently and without ceasing." The vision is solemnly declared by others to hav been several times repeated. On one occasion, says a woman who was present, all saw the resplendent figure on the wall except a girl, who, for her perversity, was followed home by the devil in the form of a black cat.

REV. ATWATER, of Knapp, Minn., is a victim of the latest clerical scandal—a scandal that seems inclined to stick, too. Early last week he was caught in an unseemly position with a pretty school-ma'am of Knapp, in the woods on a hill back of the little town. He was observed to go there with the girl by several parties, who followed them, among the crowd being one of the members of his own church. They watched the couple until the crime was committed, and then rushed in upon them. Notwithstanding this testimony, which was sworn to in a church trial, the minister and the girl, who, it seems, used to liv in his family, deny having any criminal intimacy. Their story is that the girl, who belonged to Atwater's church, had a confession to make to him. She had been guilty of the awful sin of dancing, and wanted the spiritual father's counsel. In order to hav the right kind of talk over these deeply religious matters, it was thought best to hav something more private and secure than the house they were in at Knapp, so they went to the woods, to the deep, silent, woods back of the town, the one to giv, the other to receive spiritual advice. They admit that while sitting on a log, the pastor had his arm around Miss Northrup's waist, and she was reclining her head on Mr. Atwater's bosom. To a man up a tree the story looks thin, very thin, Mr. Atwater.

FIFTY-FOUR thousand copies of a religious pamphlet entitled "Food for Thinking Christians; Why Evil was Permitted, and Kindred Topics," were distributed among the church-goers of this city last Sunday. It states that there is no hell.

CANON FARRAR, author of the "Life of Christ," and whose utterances on the existence of hell commenced the general discussion on that subject, which was carried on two years ago, is talked of as the successor to Dr. Stanley, late dean of Westminster.

THREE thousand persons assembled in Sea Cliff, Long Island, last Sunday, at the memorial service for Captain Smith of the Seawanhaka, who died recently from the effects of injuries received when his vessel was burned a year ago. Many distinguished persons were present.

THE condition of the President remains nearly unchanged, except for the continued improvement which his physicians allege is taking place. "Improving" has been the report for six weeks, and yet the patient has not recovered, and is in a critical state. People are growing anxious for him to stop "improving" and begin to get better.

CHAPTER VIII.

While I thus dedicated my hours to the muses and friendship, the windows and the attic of the palace De Sonnes were not forgotten. Mr. Bertollou had frequently offered to me in exchange for my little attic room one elegantly furnished and with a wide, pleasant view. But not for his grandest state-room, not for the view upon a paradise of Languedoc, would I hav exchanged that poor little attic room.

Accident—for I was prevented from making inquiry by a strange bashfulness—revealed to me that the family De Sonnes were expected back in a few weeks, and that they were in deep mourning over the recent death of Clementine's sister.

And the few weeks, and three months passed. As often as I touched the harp my eye was fastened upon the dear walls. But the family De Sonnes did not return, and no accident informed me why. But I was silent, and hid my loving heart from the world.

The vacation of the university came. I flew to Nismes, in hope to be more fortunate there. When I passed by the villa on the Vidourle I stopped. All was locked up, although the fields and hill-sides were alive with grain-cutters and grape-gatherers. Then I sought the enchanting place beneath the chestnuts, where once dream and reality had so charmingly intermingled. I threw myself down under the waving branches, upon the same spot which once Clementine's foot had consecrated, as it were, through its touch. Love and sentimentality drew me down. I kissed the sanctified ground that had borne all that was dear to me in this world.

Alas! in vain I hoped for the appearance of an angel. It had grown evening already, as I left the beautiful place, and above the dusky-growing plains only the rocky peaks of the Cevennes sparkled golden-red.

Mr. Etienne, and the pious mother, and Mary, Antonia, and Susan, the three daughters, received me with touching joy. I sank from heart to heart, speechless and happy, and knew not by whom I was more deeply loved, and whom I loved the most. I was the son and brother of this family; was in my home, and the joy of them all.

"Yes, thou art the joy of us all," exclaimed Mr. Etienne, moved. "And the hope of our church. All news from Montpellier has praised thy diligence, and how thy teachers esteem thee. Continue, O Colas, continue to stengthen thyself, for our sufferings are great, and the misery of the faithful has no end. God calls thee. Become his chosen armor, to break the power of antichrist, and to triumphantly lift from the dust the down-trodden gospel."

The fears of my uncle had lately been increased through hard expressions against the secret Prctesttants from the first magistrate of the province. The Marshal de Montreval resided in Nismes, and the mightier and more dreaded became this man, as he possessed the unbounded confidence of the king. His threats against the Huguenots were carried from mouth to mouth; every street-boy hallooed it at the other.

But I was tormented by another trouble. In vain had I daily passed through the street of Albertas, in vain had I wandered through the amphitheater. Clementine was nowhere visible.

On the street one morning I met the old servant, who had, by order of Madame de Sonnes, entertained me at the villa on the Vidourle. He recognized me; he shook my hand heartily, and related to me after a thousand other things Madame de Sonnes and her daughter were for the last few months not in Nismes, but in Marseilles, in order to quiet the intense grief over the loss of a dearly-beloved child and sister in the diversions of this large commercial city.

So with lost hope to catch even a momentary glimps of Clementine from afar I went sadly home. The joyful expectation which had nourished me through the full half of a year was disappointed. I made plans to go to Marseilles—it was only three days journey thither—and there I would wander from street to street, and examin window after window, and visit all churches and attend all masses, if by these means I could see her only one moment's time. Could she not for so much trouble grant me one friendly look?

But cool consideration soon destroyed this adventurous plan. And the more downcast I entered the house of Mr. Etienne.

With surprise I noticed here also, in all faces, an unusual embarrassment and unquietness. The mother stepped up to me, laid her hand on my shoulder, and kissed me, with a look of sympathy. Mary and Antonia and Susan took my hand friendly in theirs, as if they wished to console me.

"What is it, then?" asked Mr. Etienne, with strong, proud voice. He had at any rate, in spite of his pious appearance, something heroic in his character. "You know that a good Christian should be the happiest, then, when the waves of misfortune clash together the wildest. The devil has no power over us, and Providence has counted every hair of our heads. The marshal is not beyond the power of the Lord."

I made known my astonishment about all this. "Surely thou art right, Colas," said the old man; "and it vexes me the faint-heartedness of the women. The Lord Marshal de Montreval has sent here an hour ago and commanded thee to make thy appearance to-morrow morning at ten o'clock in the castle. Now thou knowest it. And what else now? Is it well with thy conscience, then go to the marshal without fear, and were the court of his castle the open jaws of hell."

Naturally could this direct command from so high a person scare this simple, quiet miller's family. Rarely the marshal showed himself to the people, and even then accompanied by a large escort of officers, noblemen, and guards. The outward pomp of the great one exercises upon the minds of the great uneducated mass more fear than their power.

The mother had, with trembling hands, next morning arranged my clothes. I soothed, with all consolation, the dear, sorrowful ones. "It is ten o'clock," exclaimed Mr. Etienne. "Go, in God's name. We pray for thee."

I went.

The Marshal de Montreval was in his cabinet. After more than an hour and a half I was led through a row of chambers and halls to him. An elderly gentleman, somewhat spare, with commanding dignity, of dark complexion, and sharp, penetrating eyes, came a few steps forward. The reverence of the bystanders pointed him out to me as the marshal.

"I wish to see you, Alamontada," said the marshal, "as you on the register of the University of Montpellier are so distinguished by praise. Cultivate your talents, you can become a useful man, and I will in the future provide for you. My encouragement must not make you proud, but more industrious. I shall further inquire after you. Do all you can to retain the friendship of your well-wisher, Bertollou, and tell him that I hav called you to me."

This it was that the marshal said to me. After a little conversation he seemed to be pleased with me. I commended myself to his grace, and hurried to console my anxiously-awaiting family.

The joy was great. Soon all the neighbors and the whole town must know it, what honor the marshal had bestowed upon me. "Did not I say it?" cried Mr. Etienne. "God it is who rules the hearts of the powerful. Out of the night arises the sun, and above the crushed serpent and the thorns of suffering towers the cross toward heaven."

CHAPTER IX.

Mr. Bertollou had gone to visit his wife in the country when I arrived in Montpellier. Not without sadness I stood in my attic room before the withered wreath. I sighed Clementine's name, and kissed the dry leaves which once blossomed beneath her tender fingers. I wanted to be ashamed of tears, which disappointed hope drove to my eyes, and yet I felt relieved through them.

The wreath and the small part of the magnificent house of de Sonnes should, through the winter, become again the mute witnesses of my joys, my hopes. "Perhaps spring will bring her, together with its flowers, to Montpellier," said I to myself, and looked over to the palace which should then contain her.

There stood at one of the high windows opposit a female figure, wrapped in black crape, her back turned to me. My pulse stopped, my breath ceased, it grew dark before my eyes. "That can be only Clementine!" it spoke within me; but strengthless I sunk down, lying in the window, and had not the courage and not the power to look over and seek certainty.

When I had re-collected my strength I raised myself up and stealthily threw a look over. Her face was turned toward me, surrounded by a black veil. The breeze played in the folds of the veil; it was raised—I saw Clementine, and in a moment, in which I seemed to hav attracted her attention.

I cast down my eyes. A fire never before felt burned in my veins. I thought I must sink into the ground. And when again I looked over she had disappeared from the window, but not from my inmost look.

"It is she!" it resounded in me, and I stood on the very hight of human blissfulness, alone, only Clementine's picture before me. A golden glitter flowed over the gray walls, and above the barren roofs floated a rich sea of flowers. The world under me vanished like a shining cloud. The form of Clementine went through the lovely eternity, and I was beside Clementine, and my lot nameless enchantment. "Ah! what blissfulness is the human heart capable of!" cried I, and sunk down upon my knees and raised my hands toward heaven, crying aloud, "O God! for what hours hast thou preserved me! O make this emotion everlasting!"

CHAPTER X.

It was Clementine. In the evening beamed the windows with light, and I saw her figure float by them.

When it was late, I took the harp, and in its sounds my feelings gradually grew calmer.

The next morning I awoke late. Sleepless for me the night had passed. When I stepped to the window Clementine was already in hers in her morning robe. I bowed to her; my salutation was hardly noticeably returned. But still she looked friendly up again. As long as she was in her window, I also was bound to mine; sometimes our bashful looks met. My soul spoke to her, and to me it seemed as if I heard low answers.

O blessed hours, which I dreamed away harmless in stolen glances. Poor and of low descent as I, and without being able to lay claim to handsomeness, with which I could please, how dared I to raise my hopes up to the most amiable and richest heiress of Montpellier, for whose favor the richest youths in the country wooed?

And how gladly tarry my thoughts in the memory of those days! Friendship and love are the property of mortals only; he does not share them with the beasts. Friendship and love, children of the amalgamation of the human and godlike in us, are the crowns of humanity. We are more pious, more faithful, more regardful, more at home in the universe, and more self-reliant then; and we endure the thorns along the wayside, and also a wilderness shines brightly in the glitter of a fantasy burning quietly in love.

In the evening I took the harp from the corner and made the strings resound. I played the "Sufferings of Count Peter de Provence, and the loved Magellone," at that time one of the newest, most celebrated, and touching ballads, full of expressiv melody. When I had ended the first stanza, and rested my hand for a moment, there came back to me the low sound of a harp through the stillness of the night playing the same piece. Who else could it be than Clementine, who seemed to hav the desire to become the echo of my own emotions? When she had ended, I began again. So we changed alternately. Music is the language of the soul. What an unspeakable delight for my heart; Clementine deemed me worthy of conversation!

Ah, thousands of nameless little things, which only receive their immense value through the sense in which they are given and accepted, I must pass with silence; but they are unforgotten. Even the corpse of the beautiful dream of youth, remembrance is, although lifeless, always charming.

And so the dream lasted two years. For two years we saw ourselvs silent and loving, and spoke together through the voice of the strings, and never approached each other. I knew the church in which she prayed. There I was also and prayed with her. I knew the days, when she, accompanied by her mother and her lady friends, went walking under the shade trees of the Peyron;* there I was also. Her look recognized me then and rewarded me timidly.

Without having spoken once to each other during this long time, we had gradually become the greatest confidants. We disclosed to each other our joy and our sorrow; we begged and granted and hoped and feared, made vows to each other and broke them never.

Nobody fancied the intercourse of our souls, our intimacy. Only Mr. Bertollou's kindness often exposed me to the danger of losing all my joys. He wanted by all means to giv me better rooms; not without effort I secured for myself the further possession of the attic room.

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

The Druids did not believe in eternal punishment, but simply a chastisment—a natural one—either in this life or the next. They taught that as the soul attained the line of liberty (human existence), if the evil predominated in its nature, so after death not only was it punished but it was set back in Abred (preëxistence) as far as its experience required. If so bad as to be set back to the lowest stage of existence it only entered anew upon the progressiv stages of metempsychosis, till it was finally humanized again, wiser from its preceding experiences. This process might be repeated several times, but the gate of bliss was always open if it deserved to enter. But straight was the path and narrow the gate, etc. Annwn and Abred represented the grand crucible in which all mortals were disintegrated and re-combined to enter upon this progressiv stage to gwynvyd (bliss). A refining, purifying, process, as gold and iron are prepared by fire for higher uses.

The Jews sacrificed to Jehovah as an appeasement of his wrath as manifested in physical and natural evils, not as an everlasting atonement for sin, as the Christians believe.

In bardism every male was symbolic of Hü, while every female was symbolic of nature, his complement, and the Jews sacrificed the animals which represented his symbols, the bull Taurus, the lamb Aries, and the goat Capricorn, while the Christians claim they were but types of the sacrifice of Hü, Hes, Jes, Jesous, or Jesus, as the name was modified according to the Greek and Latin languages. This was a grand mistake. They did not typify or foreshadow anything of the kind, for they were simply symbolic of the annual death of the sun-god (Hü). The Jews never claimed that they typified the messiah, for he was to come as a king in his glory and establish his kingdom on earth even as the Christians expect the second advent of Jesus (Hü). But the author of the epistle to the Hebrews strongly supports the typical idea.

Bardism held that nature was the bride of Hü, and she and her progeny were persecuted by the principle of evil (Avagdhu) who also demanded this death of Hü as an atonement or exchange for the liberation of nature in the spring. But some of the oriental nations assumed that the bride was also sacrificed, hence they sacrificed female animals, also symbolical of nature's zodiacal signs, to wit; Jephthah's daughter and Iphigenia. Hü was king and lord of heaven and earth, also the high priest, Arawn (Aaron) he sacrificed. No man taketh away my life. I lay it down of mine own accord. In his death he was supposed to enter the archaic womb, stone ark, representing the black virgin of Arthan, to be born again and resume his work of revivifying nature and her progeny. Thus he was the resurrection and the life. But in his symbolic title of word of God (creature force) he was also the chief oracle, prophet, priest, and king. By another transposition Abel (Avagdhu), who is the first murderer and instituter of sacrifice, is elevated to be a martyr. He, as A Bel, or Baal, is simply the destroyer, while the dispute between the brothers is the incarnated myth of the continual war between good and evil—between Hü in Hevin (summer solstice) and Avagdhu in Arthan (winter solstice)—between pure aspirations (A wen) and temptations to evil (wdhu)—the opposition between Alpha and Omega—the positiv creativ force (logos) and the negativ disintegrativ principle, decay, death, change. This appears in the Hindoo bardic myths as the war between Brahma and Siva, who fought till the circles of heaven were displaced, referring probably to the eccentricity of the zodiacal revolutions and precession of the equinoxes. They state that these two deities were also incarnated and under the appellations of Dacsha and Chardama (Cain and Abel), sons of Adim (Adam) the first man. This Adim is sometimes called Menu from the White Isle. The strife was perpetuated by the brothers in their mortal form, but in their immortal condition neither was able to slay the other, but as mortals, Dacsha is said to hav slain his brother Chardama; in other places vice versa, Chardama slays Dacsha, cuts off his head and burns it upon the altar, the place of the skull (where the sun, shorn of his beams and bald, is destroyed, Golgotha). But when Dacsha was resuscitated he received a goat's head (Capricorn). (See Sir W. Jones's Asiatic Researches, vol v, pp. 254, 245; vol. vi, p. 473.)

Taking all these coincidences into consideration it is not surprising that Christian writers hav made out that Cain slew Abel upon Saturday. Abram offering Isaac is traceable to the same mythical source. Aaron, the high priest, who went annually in the temple of the Yoni, holy of holies, is the same descent into Arthan. The Jewish and Christian festivals are simply changes of season and zodiacal symbols. Thus the Jewish New Year is in September, typical of the advent of Avagdhu, the destroyer, and their Sabbath upon the seventh day. Saidwrn's day, Saturday. The fire-worshipers and pagans held their Nauroy or New Year in March, the advent of Hü or Helios or Elia (spring), seven months earlier than the Jews; the names of the months bear the stamp of this to the present day. The Christians in the fourth century fixed the birth of Christ upon the 25th of December, the day when Hü emerges, or is born from the womb of the black virgin, and crucify him about the time of the vernal equinox, when he crosses the line. It is commonly charged against the Druids that they were guilty of human sacrifice, and quote Cæsar as an authority that the Druids often did so. To these ignorant prejudiced people I say that it does not follow that the British Druids did likewise, any more than French Catholicism is an index of what British Protestantism is. I claim upon the authority of our triads that the Druidic mysteries of the British gorsedd were never fully explained or carried out anywhere outside of Great Britain.

It has been proved that as all other nations were guilty of sacrificing human beings and animals, hence many will say the Druids also were not exempt from this stain. This I deny; the British Druids were the exception to the rule.

The Christian writers especially who lie under the ban most vehemently decry the Druids and say they were guilty of building huge wicker images and burning their captives. They hav failed utterly to prove the least of their assertions. And some of these writers are utterly astray as regards Druidic mythology. They accuse them of pantheism and say they worshiped Taranis the thunderer, Onvana the sea-goddess, etc., characters and names unknown to British gorsedd. They assert that the cromlechs and logan stones were our altars, but we as adepts know better—that they were symbolic arks.

They point to the fact that the stones are hollowed to receive the blood of the victims and that there were hewn channels for the blood to flow down. These were simply fonts for the baptism of the neophytes, an ordinance strictly Druidic. No one but a sect who indorsed sacrifices and who believe that an innocent man took the punishment upon himself which they so richly deserve, and who yet feast upon his flesh and blood as a most holy sacrament, could make out such a case, and, being blackened themselvs, wish to stain and smirch an order of the most humane, peaceable, and intelligent men the world ever saw.

In refutation I would inquire where are there any traces of fire visible upon any of the Druidic stones? Is not the nature of these stones such as would not stand the action of fire without splitting?

Strabo (Book 3, ch 1) quotes Ephorus, a witness 2,200 years ago, to the effect that he participated in the Druidic rites at their temple and logan stone in northern Spain, and that sacrifice was abhorrent to them.

It is as plain as day that the Hindoo Menu is identical with Menw of the Druids, and the Hindoo scriptures confirm the idea also that Menu of the three shouts is Cain with the nod (a mark, a symbol); hence we hav notum, notorious, etc., and his city of refuge (sanctuary) are all part and parcel of Druidism. Cain was a vegetarian, a tiller of the ground; Abel a herder who butchered his flock for sacrifice carnivorous, which naturally would be the murderer.

Again, the philosophy of Druidism is entirely opposed to the doctrin of atonement by sacrifice. Its sentiments indicate as if its entire system had developed itself in some golden age of truly natural teachings, and the voice of God, the language of nature, the authority for their actions, when priestcraft and idolatrous practices had not conceived the idea of sacrifice.

It was impossible and inconsistent with the teaching of bardism that sacrifice should be a part of the rites, as the sacrifice was to the devil, the evil principle.

The devil, or Evil One, again, was not a personage nor deity, but was recognized as the opposit of good, and indispensable, as darkness is the opposit of light. The idea would be abhorrent to them that the principle of all good would delight in the slaughter of innocent lives for guilty ones, and would be deemed blasphemous.

The Jewish idea of atonement for the family, and the Christian idea of atonement for the sins of the world, would seem ridiculous to them, for life was esteemed to be only temporary and probational, while evil doing was certain to be expiated here or hereafter; no remission of sins was possible, neither was eternal punishment to be dreaded, as though put back in Abred, progression through metempsychosis was continually possible. To them the universe was one grand crucible in the processes of dissolution, and reconstruction were carried on perpetually. Punishment was understood to be the varied experiences which were undergone, and necessary to shape and mold the character and fit it for entrance into gwynvyd (bliss). Repentance meant an undoing for the evil, restoring that which was stolen fourfold; giving up his life as a punishment for murder voluntarily, to be slain by the sword—never by fire.

Christians acknowledge that sacrifice is unnatural, yet they accuse the Druids, who were nature-worshipers, of this practice. Sacrifices were for them unavailing. They hold that to win favor with the deity they had to bridle their apetites, crucify their vanity and lusts, subdue all cruel and wicked feelings in their own persons; to devote their energies as a sacrifice for the common good, and obey the voice of their father and mother—God and nature.

Now the Jewish God of blood and lust holds sway in the land, and our beloved soil is defiled with Jewish names, every chapel is a Carmel, a Zoar, a Bethany, etc., while lambs and goats and sheep are intermingled with their prayers in ludicrous confusion, while the Druid with clean hands and pure lips is scoffed at and must not raise his voice in defense of the creed of his ancestors.

Our temples were never defiled by blood, idol-worship, or priestly delusions. Pure philosophical temples were they, and their motto was always, "The truth against the world."

What Morality hav We Left?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: This is the title of a very interesting article in the North American Review for May. The writer seems to hav swept the field of thought only to find that we hav no basis of morality, even as we hav none of religion; that the world is slowly drifting into a belief in hedonism and altruism, and that our moral convictions are only the association of ideas, and "like all other intuitiv or necessary beliefs," are "merely the product of the gathered experience of our ancesters, animal and human, through the ascidian, the mollusk, the monkey, on to man, and handed down by heredity," and that conscience consists of nervous modification become hereditary. Now all this is correct reasoning and the outcome of the ages. The world of to-day really livs for happiness. We are all hedonists. We all liv for the joys and goods of existence. We labor for the general good of humanity here on earth. We seek to make men wiser, better, and happier here and now, and hav left the gods and ghosts out of our calendar. We are really altruists. We believe that to be regardful of the interests of others is promoting our own highest happiness. We cannot enjoy our pleasures when we feel that our brothers and sisters are in want, misery, and destitution. We feel that it is not happiness in its highest sense, when a few are rich, educated, and cultured, and the masses are ignorant, poor, and rude. We realize that we need the full sympathy and assistance of all who surround us. We want them to understand and appreciate the higher and purer joys that thrill and happify us. We see them bound to old, effete superstitious notions, and behold them ingraining them into their children, thus perpetuating them down through the ages, and we long to lift them up higher and giv them of our truths and our pleasures.

Speaking of Spencer's ethics, one writer says: "As an ethics for a hundred thousand years or ages hence, Spencer's is perfect and will be so acknowledged when that time comes. The fine nervous organization which constitutes Mr. Spencer's mind will then be dissolved and unconscious; but he will be thoroughly appreciated by the finer organizations dwelling on the earth, and placed above our highest philosophers and scientists." But when he goes on to say: "All things are tending toward an era of absolute morality, when pain, and what men call sin, will hav disappeared. In the struggle for excellence, all sharp points and roughness will be removed and everything became rounded and smoothed as the pebbles which lie on our beach hav been by the dashing of the ocean currents. The hights having been ground down and the hollows filled, all will be one rich plain," I must disagree with him. We cannot conceive of a time when there will be no pain and no sin. Nor would it be desirable. We must hav sharp contrasts, or where will be our motiv for work? What would there be to strive for? Besides, the natural history of events shows us that with every invention, every new acquisition, comes on a new list of new desires, needs, and wants. With every step toward a higher education and a higher morality, new crimes, new sins, and new immoralities spring into being. The more we know the more we find it possible to err. Our joys become deeper, and as a necessary consequence our sorrows more acute. We find more avenues opening to us that lead to pleasure, but we also realize that the roads to unhappiness are also increasing. While great sins, brutal, coarse, and vulgar crimes are being gradually eliminated from progressiv humanity, the whole amount of misery and vice is probably not lessened at all.

While it is possible that the hills and hollows of earth may in time disappear, and "all be one rich plain," would this be desirable? Would it in reality be rich? Would it not be one vast marsh of watery plains? And then as ages rolled on the waters would dry up and all become dead desolation. The hills and valleys are beautiful luxuries, and should be prized and valued as inestimable adjuncts to our happiness that no sane, sensible person would wish to be deprived of. What earth would be without them it is impossible to conceive. Just so with regard to many of our unfulfilled desires. We may paint fanciful pictures of the "wished-for something unpossessed," but the consequences of the fruition of our desires might be far from blissful ones.

Let us then enjoy and appreciate the now and make the most and the best of it. Let us be hedonists and altruists and make our own beautiful earth as much of a paradise as we can, and scatter happiness wherever we can, for > "The world it is beautiful; who can complain,

> Or wish that the world were made over again?
> There are valleys so sweet where the violets grow
> And dales breathing fragrance wide-spreading below."

The Odium Theologicum.

If there are loves there must he hatreds. Hatreds are not happiness—not the best, at any rate. Of all hatreds, the one most odious, unnecessary, and mischievous is the theological. It comes of mistaking a figure of speech for a reality; a fiction of the imagination for a knowable fact. Were the personality of God a fact, man could no more know it than the infinitly little can comprehend the infinitly great. God as a figure of speech may be useful, according to the use it is put to. But, assuming that there is an actual person outside of all individual mind and matter, with a will, the cause and reason for all obligation and duty, and then professing to know and declare that will, by the authority of that person, has been the fountain of the worst evils that the human race has hitherto suffered. This assumption is theology. The odium culminates when theology asserts that he that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be eternally damned, and, in behalf of the alleged divine will, commences the damnation in this life.

The only excuse for this arrogance of assumption is that without it all human law, order, decency, happiness, and peace would perish—all sense of obligation and duty would cease—human society would become as intolerable as any of the fabled hells.

Let us stop and think a moment. Suppose the infinit, arbitrary, omnipotent, personal will is a fact, and without it no material thing or individual mind could exist. Would, by any power or choice of that will, two hav been no more than one, a cube the same as a globe, space the same as time? No? Then there are uncreated verities; abstract principles of law and order, recognizable by the human mind, altogether superior to and indestructible by any possible or conceivable will. They must inevitably dominate and govern will, whether finite or infinit. If your personal God must submit to and be governed by the uncreated verities, where is his use as a creator? If the principles of form, order, harmony, and their domination over the course of time and things are discoverable by the human mind, and if the will of the infinit person, supposing one exists, must in effect be identical with them, what difference to us or to him can our belief in his existence make? It is quite as accordant with reason—though beyond the grasp of reason—to assume that the material world is from eternity, uncreated, as that a person uncreated, existing from eternity apart from matter, did finally, after an eternity, create matter out of nothing. On either theory a personal moral government of the universe is a sinecure.

We are capable of discovering certain uncreated verities which all mundane things and persons obey to their happiness, or disobey to their cost. And so must a personal God, if he exists. How silly then to say that if the personality of God drops out of the faith of men and women, there will be moral chaos! —worse than now!

But the theologians will say: If you abolish theology, there will be nothing above us to love and reverence. We are emotional beings. You would starve our best and highest emotions. Even your giant Infidel, Voltaire, said, If there were no God it would be necessary to invent one. He dedicated a house to God.

Very well, there is no objection to the figure of speech, sanctified by the grandest of human poetry. If God means the uncreated but knowable verities let him hav any amount and grandeur of fanes—the school-houses are the best he has now—where the wonders of geography, chemistry, and astronomy may and must inspire reverence, seeing how all things, the most apparently stupid and lifeless, obey with alacrity the uncreated unity of omnipotent, omnipresent, impersonal truth. So much for reverence. As to love, what is the law of its being? What holds the oceans to the land? Doubtless they are in love with the sun, and still more with the moon. But they do not elope with either. They only coquet a little, a yard or so generally, or perhaps twenty yards when the land ungraciously objects. Why is this? Simply because love (we must hav figures of speech) holds them in stronger than conjugal bonds to the rigid earth. The uncreated verity proclaims that love shall be, like gravity, inversely as the square of the distance (figure again), for one of its laws. The love of God, even as defined in the Christian creeds, compared with the love of one's mother, wife, husband, child, or bosom friend, must necessarily be about in the ratio of the attraction between a mundane granit rock and the invisible, undiscovered astronomical center of the universe, compared with the attraction between the hornblende and feldspar in the rock. To make God a person, and set him up as the object of supreme love—superior to a loving human father, mother, husband, wife, child, or bosom friend, is not only a shamful, but a shameful, outrage upon the laws of nature. No such love can, by any possibility, be real or genuin. There may be fear or some other emotion in or behind it, but it is not love.

Subtract from nature the arbitrary, omnipotent will which theology imposes on her, and we may hav some peace and composure in having to obey what she tries to obey, and to put up with the evils she puts up with. But once accept the assumption of personality in or over nature, and that person is proved by facts everywhere visible to be a monster, responsible for cruelty, pain, and failure, as well as the reverse. In fact to hav any peace of mind at all we hav to split God in two and hav two Gods at war with each other—one responsible for the good, and the other for the evil. It surely is more comfortable to every intelligent being to make a god of the attraction of gravitation, acting uniformly, without any personal will or choice, or the slightest regard to the consequences to any person or race.

This is a live world, into which love thrusts us helpless, to grow, think, do, and die—the irresistible, whirling globes, hot and cold, are all alive in every infinitesimal atom—with a unity and infinit variety of life. If this life is God, as dear, good, lens-grinding Spinoza thought, we are part of God. Does not this make us hav an ambition to be good? Of course we shall be good just in proportion as we understand and obey the uncreated verities.

What good morals, or the best morals, are is not yet distinctly decided. Perhaps they differ with different races of intelligent beings—not alike for sheep and wolves, for example. Each race has to decide for itself, and each individual of a race has to judge for himself and take the consequences. The human race embraces the greatest variety of character—the characteristics of all races, in fact. Some men are lions, some hippopotami, some wolves, some sheep, some foxes, some swine, some (perhaps many) donkeys. But it is found most comfortable to make them all equal before the law, and the law as limited as may be. This is called liberty. We cannot carry it to the perfection which is enjoyed by that wonderful race, the Musca Domestica, or common house fly. There must be politicians to do a good deal of buzzing for the human race. But the more liberty is used, especially in speech and literature, the less law is needed, and the happier the morals grow.

If history proves anything, or observation and experiment prove anything, they prove that good, happy, comfortable morals did not and never do grow out of theology. There is something else that makes them grow in human hearts and minds without the aid and against the obstruction of theology. Calling a book holy that makes God stop the rotation of the earth to aid one tribe of Arabs in cutting the throats of another, or that makes him but one-third of his infinit self into the body of a carpenter to be murdered by wicked men, to appease his own anger at their wickedness, cannot reasonably be supposed to increase human goodness. And if it cannot, it had better be said, shock where and whom it will. Exempting all the ecclesiastical machinery in this great republic from taxation, on the pretense that theology promotes good morals, is a great political and social mistake. Why, if all the time, labor, and money now wasted in praying and teaching what nobody knows, or ever can know, were honestly employed in practicing and teaching the human arts, which raise man above the beast, all the toiling millions would be happier in this life, and better prepared for any life that may follow.

The odium theologicum is a viper that poisons itself with its own fangs. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

The Concord School of Philosophy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Perhaps your readers hav hardly been introduced to the new academe within a few years established at Concord, Mass.

It owes birth and being probably more to Mr. A. Bronson Alcott, the sage and scholar of that somewhat noted town, than to any other person. But its annual sessions are now widely known as seasons of great literary and speculativ interest. And its lecturers include some of the most eminent thinkers, writers, and scholars in the land, both women and men. And the Boston press is liberal to a high degree in reports of the lectures delivered, papers read, and subsequent discussions.

The now noted, if not notorious, Joseph Cook, famous for a number of years as Monday-noon lecturer in Boston, was credited, and perhaps rightly, with two rather remarkable achievements; the establishment of a sort of semi-scientific professorship at Andover Theological Seminary, and the conversion of Mr. A. Bronson Alcott to the Andover school of theology and philosophy. He also boasted Mr. Emerson as a convert, but Mr. Emerson's family and friends made haste to deny the somewhat audacious claim, and no more was ever heard of it.

Nor is much yet known of the new Andover professor. He was to reconcile all differences between theology and science, harmonize all difficulties between Genesis and geology, explain how Joshua compelled the sun to stand still a whole day in the sky, while he slew the hosts of the Amorites, and other unpleasantnesses that hav disturbed the peace of the church since science has presumed to question its divine authority and character.

But in spite of Professor Gulliver (remarkable name for a master in theology) all these mooted problems remain as undetermined as before.

But the church and clergy had great hope, and the fervid Joseph Cook great expectations, in the new chair and Professor Gulliver. Too great for such sore disappointment.

And now, among the trinity of comets for 1881, already appearing and disappearing, a new star of hope and promis has risen in the new Concord School of Philosophy. The Boston daily evening Traveler, one of the largest and ablest of the city journals, last Thursday copied the following from the Concord correspondence of the New York World:

"The one thing which seems most prominent in the Concord school is that the whole movement is directed against modern philosophy. The most orthodox could not enter exception to any of the views expressed. Even Professor Harris, who seems to be more purely speculativ than any other of the speakers, speaking of a certain view says it is only in this way that we can see the movement of providence in history. Everything tends to the presence of a personal God. It is the outcome of Kant's philosophy, it seems by a uselessly roundabout road, though Heine says it was done to please his servant Lanner, or through fear of the police. Whatever the means, it is accepted by the transcendental philosophers of Concord. . . . They predict a revival of the philosophy of Kant, and see tokens of the coming. Materialism is a cant term they use, like a red flag, to frighten the crowd. Although the word is not mentioned on the platform it circulates through the audience. Spencer, who is not mentioned by the speaker, is classed among the Materialists, who are evidently regarded among the Camp-stools as a low set."

Mr. Alcott presides at the sittings with his usual dignity and urbanity; is evidently well pleased with the general current of thought and expression, especially when in the line of the extract cited above. Indeed, I do not understand that he has ever disavowed, or his friends for him, what was claimed and loudly boasted, too, concerning him by the Boston Monday-noon evangelist.

I am very far from being myself what is commonly called a Materialist. But I am cheerfully coöperating with them and all others who are honestly and earnestly seeking a larger liberty in things theological and religious than is now enjoyed, or can be expected while the present powers that be in state and church bear rule.

Democracy holds sway through the Catholic, the Republican party by Protestant power and influence. Both believe in and teach a personal God, passionate and powerful, and so, it appears, does the Concord School of Philosophy. And so do all accredited schools, colleges, universities, and theological seminaries in the land. Let all Liberals of every name hear and understand. PARKER PILLSBURY.

The Dogma of the Immortality of the Soul.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of the 16th, it appears to me that friend Bruce is singularly inconsistent when he asks us Liberals to "not trifle with the belief in the immortality of the soul; not to attempt to create a love for the blanching doctrin of the soul's annihilation;" "That the belief in immortality, with its multifarious spiritual proofs, is not the antagonist we ought to assail, but that we should seek to expose and exterminate the ignorant assumption of mercenary, cunning, aristocratic priestcraft."

I would ask friend Bruce if the whole fabric which supports in idleness this "aristocratic priesthood" is not, from pillar to dome, resting upon that one stone, a belief in the immortality of the soul. Take from the Christian religion that one belief, and the whole structure would crumble to dust and dissolve itself into "multifarious spiritual proofs" that the Christian portion of the world has been led about in darkness by this set of designing, praying, and preying pirates, levying burdensome taxes upon the poor, credulous dupes, their followers, that these "drones upon society" might liv a pleasant, luxurious life. If, then, by one well-directed assault upon this corner-stone of the Christian religion, we can demolish the entire structure, why should we spend our time and energies pulling the shingles off the roof one by one, hoping thereby to accomplish our purpose as speedily as by demonstrating the falsity of the idea of an immortal soul and the uncertainty of an immortality after death, thus undermining and pulling the foundation away from this false belief, leaving nothing for this "aristocratic priesthood" " to stand upon?

Because we hav been taught from childhood to believe that we possess an immortal soul, is that any argument why that now, when we find no sort of reasoning that will sustain such teachings, we should still cling to that old superstitious or fabled belief? Why should we not come out boldly and speak plainly to all mankind and ask, What proof can you offer that your teaching is correct?

Now, friend Bruce, if you are honest in a belief that man has an immortal soul, and that there is an abode set apart for a habitation for these intangible, invisible somethings that without a body shall walk the golden streets of paradise, will sing anthems of praise for ever and ever, and wear upon their invisible bodies wings to carry them through space, while the unfortunate's body or no body burns in the "lake of fire and brimstone through all eternity," will you please answer me the following three questions that just now occur to my mind:

In order to prove the existence of an immortal soul, first, please explain where that soul was ten, twenty, fifty, a hundred, or a thousand years prior to the birth of the child.

Second. Where is the soul of the insane when they become so devoid of reason that the brute creation, without a soul, shows a greater intelligence than the once intelligent being; and,

Thirdly. Where, after the body dies, does that soul find an abiding-place?

There are several other questions which I find will force themselvs in as followers to these, which I will briefly state.

If, when the soul leaves the body, it flies off into space, of what substance is it composed to enable it to withstand the indescribable cold it would encounter as it would pass farther and farther from the earth into space, and when passing from point to point, with what velocity would it travel, and how long would it require to reach the nearest fixed star wherein there would be a possibility of finding a resting-place; and should you doubt its ability to remain there, how long, supposing it to travel at the same velocity as light, would it take that immortal soul to travel through the intervening space to a place beyond the human vision, for by the aid of the most powerful telescopes of to-day no place is found within the range of the human eye answering the description given of the New Jerusalem?

If the only proof we hav of an immortal soul or of a future immortal existence is that which has been handed down from generation to generation, from the most remote period of man's existence, when ignorance and superstition ruled the world, originating no one knows where, or by whom first proclaimed, or by what authority it was so proclaimed, the whole system resting upon bare supposition, I prefer to do my own supposing, basing my conclusions upon the thousands of years of experience and enlightenment that hav intervened between that time and the present, and take for my guide the present knowledge and our own experience in preference to the old mythologies of an almost forgotten age. I prefer to choose from my own store of knowledge of the past, obtained from many sources, what course to pursue and aim to liv out that which I know of, and let that of which I know nothing, or of which it is impossible for me to find out anything, alone as something not worth worrying myself about. If, therefore, we liv an upright life in this world, which we know of, there is no cause why we should trouble ourselvs regarding a world about which we nor anybody else ever has nor ever can know anything. Instead of troubling ourselvs about how to avoid a future place of punishment or to gain one of happiness, let us devote that time toward the more laudable and useful purpose of trying to assist our fellow-man to a higher standard in the scale of human happiness. The body and soul soul—mind—are inseparable; when the body ceases to liv there is no further use for the mind to control its actions. The mind is the motion of the watch, the wheels and pulleys the body; when these wear out or become deranged the motion ceases; where does it go? The flame of the lamp shines brightly so long as the oil feeds it; when that fails the bright flame of but a few minutes ago is gone. Where did it go? If you cannot tell, do not ask, or expect, that the flame or motion exists after the human body is dead.

Disprove immortality and the whole victory is won. D. D. LAKE.

A Voice from Erin.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Many views are expressed in relation to Bishop Purcell's Cincinnati banking system of cheating creditors. Some say it would be hard to sell the church property, as it belonged to the congregation, and the bishop was only a trustee. This is a fine system of fraud to deprive honest people of receiving what justly belongs to them. When a bishop or priest becomes embarrassed by worldly speculation the church property where he presides or officiates should be sold to meet the indebtedness the same as a citizen's house and land can be sold by law.

A Catholic bishop or priest purchases land, or builds thereon to suit himself; the congregation simply pays the necessary funds from time to time to meet the priest's demands. The clergyman of such aforesaid congregation does not consult said congregation when he wants to get money by mortgages on said property, or consult them (the laity) on the heavy insurances they get on said church property. Therefore the equal justice of law should deal with the aforesaid clergy, or any other denomination that holds the deeds of said property. As this delusion is generally understood at present, the bishop and the church is the wife to the congregation, and the property cannot be touched for debts that the bishop or priest justly owes to the laity. When the Republican party made U. S. Grant, when President of the United States, a present of a fine mansion on Fifth avenue, New York, U. S. Grant could deed it to his lawful wife, and who could touch it for the debts and defalcation of U. S. Grant?

This is the plainest and most just way that church property can be understood in order to protect honest industry and just and equal laws for priest and layman, and throw away the cloak of hypocrisy from all classes of citizens. No wonder Infidelity spreads all over the civilized world where so many Christian wrongs are daily combating with equal rights and common sense. M. H. BLACKFORD.

The American Bible Society Attacked.

The revision will demonstrate how utterly unnecessary is this enormously rich, expensiv, and respectable, but not lively, corporation for the production and sale of Bibles. By the time it shall hav made up its multitudinous mind what it is going to do about it, it will hav ceased to be of any considerable practical importance to the public whether it does anything about it or not. The demand for copies of the revised version will hav been amply supplied, in the way of business—by publishers making a profit on their work and paying interest on their capital, and allowing compensation to the retailer and the book agent—with books as cheap, as elegant, as accurate, and as durable as can be furnished by the huge charitable society, with its immense capital (a free gift); and its army of book agents, salaried by the churches; and its high-toned piety, which is quite too spiritual to permit it to do business on business principles or conform to the divine constitution of human society. The revision will make it plain by practical experiment that the American Bible Society is the principal existing hindrance to the circulation of the holy scriptures. In the course of a few months the revised New Testament will be found on sale in every considerable village, and even in every small village, in the United States, in great varieties of style and price, and tens of thousands of families, who never hav seen a Bible society's "colporteur" (cant for book pedler), will hav had it offered for sale at their doors with the earnestness of men and women whose livelihood depends on their finding customers. If, then, any person shall be moved by curiosity to ask the bookseller, or the news-vender, or the country grocer, or the "colporteur," "Why did you never hav Bibles to sell before, such as we wanted to buy for our children, and our new married couples, and for gifts in Sunday-schools, and for a pastor's gifts among his people?" the truth will come out that this keeping of the Bible away from the ready access of the people in Christian regions was the result of the settled and obstinate policy of the Bible Society, by which "alarming destitutions" were created, that should figure impressivly in the annual report, and that could be supplied only by large contributions to the society or its auxiliaries.

If the children of light were wise in their generation (which they are not), the effect of the automatic production and circulation of the revision would lead the churches, in answer to petitions for a little more money in behalf of manufacturing and trading corporations that do not manufacture and sell for profit, but only for the glory of God, to say respectfully, but firmly: "Not another dollar. You hav had more than is good for you already. Henceforth, if Bibles and tracts are wanted we will giv money to missionary societies, or to committees organized for the purpose, wherewithal to go into open market and buy what they want. And then, if you can furnish the best goods at the lowest price, you will get our money and not otherwise."

The revised New Testament will, perhaps, be the happy occasion of demonstrating the imbecility, the lunatic idiocy (pardon the inadequacy of the expressions), that directed the form of constitution of the Bible Society and of all the societies that are fashioned on that model. This constitution may be briefly described as absolute government by a ring, limited by the annual possibility of a mob. As a former secretary of the society gently states it, "the society has an immense constituency, and while an annual meeting may be very small, it may also be very large and very stormy;" which is Dr. Taylor's mild way of expressing the fact that once a year the society with its immense property counting up into the millions, and with the vast spiritual responsibilities which it controls, is tossed out to be nimbly picked up and brought back into the office by the governing ring, or to be cleverly caught and run away with by any five score or ten score of adventurers that might combine for the purpose; or (supposing some agitating question of policy to arise) to be stormed over and wrangled over by so many of the forty thousand life members and of the practically illimitable number of three-dollar annual members as can manage to force themselvs into the closet where the annual meeting is held. By dexterous avoiding of divisiv questions, by backing down from their right and duty for fear of an agitation, the management of the society hav kept thus far from the general knowledge of the public the grave fact that its constitution is rotten in every timber. Those who feel it to be a part of Christian expediency to keep such a matter hushed up as long as possible may well look forward w th terror to the approach of an inevitable controv ersy, in which prejudice and sentimentality will be pitted against scholarship and conscience. Those, on the other hand, who hold that the highest expediency is to expose and reform such abuses at the earliest will not dread the shaking of them down and the removing of them away, "that the things which cannot be shaken may remain." To such persons the longer hiding of the constitutional condition of the Bible Society and the inviting of charitable gifts to be deposited where their security is constitutionally impossible seems a scandal against public morals; and the approach of a controversy about the Society's policy, which will certainly be earnest, and which threatens to be acrimonious, looks like the providential "accessory means to the greatest good." I seriously believe this fat, overgrown, lazy monopoly to be a public nuisance, hindering the circulation of the scriptures in this country, and accomplishing nothing in any country that would not be better done if it were removed. LEONARD WOOLSEY BACON.

Plucky Bradlaugh.

People who turn in dismay from the rowdyish proceedings with which some of the sessions of the lower house of the United States Congress has in time past been disturbed may possibly find something in recent occurrences in the British House of Commons to lift the sense of humiliation they hav felt over like occurrences in their own country. The most of these people hav turned to England for an example of lofty dignity and statesmanship in times when they hav been disgusted at home. The other day Bradlaugh, member-elect from Northampton to the House of Commons, was denied his seat on the ground that, being an Atheist, to swear in the name of God would not, in the view of the House, bind his conscience. He determined to resist so unhallowed a proceeding as to unseat him for such trivial reasons, and did resist. But there were several other reasons back of this for shutting the door against Bradlaugh, though how well grounded they were as a cause for keeping a legally-elected member out of his seat is not for us to discuss, as the House seems to hav preferred the former charge. These reasons were that he is an Obstructionist, that he hopes to vie with the Home Rulers as a source of trouble, and otherwise attempt to make a bear-garden out of the House. But Bradlaugh is a man of force, and he gave notice that he should insist on taking his seat. He made the attempt, and was carried out by the police. He returned to the scene backed by a crowd of followers, and attempted to force an entrance to the House, but was overpowered. The case will not rest here, for Bradlaugh's cause becomes the cause of human liberty. What he might do in case he got his seat is not for the House to consider. He was elected in due form and sent by his people to serve them. That he is an Atheist is not a just ground either for his expulsion. Parliament has had its momentary triumph, but at the polls the people will again assert the rights of constituencies to the member of their choice, and the next House will undoubtedly seat Mr. Bradlaugh. There are several similar examples in English history. Wilkes, editor of the North Briton, was in 1869 expelled from the House of Commons on the ground of impious and seditious libel. He was again elected by his people, but was not allowed to sit. Another election was held. He gained it by a large majority, but Parliament held the court candidate, Luttrell, to be elected. Wilkes was arrested for the seditious utterance of his paper and exiled. He was finally imprisoned for twenty-two months. Luttrell held his seat all this time. On Wilkes's release he was again elected in the midst of an excitement that threatened the throne itself, and this time was permitted to take his seat, and sent back to several successiv Parliaments—a triumph for Wilkes that proved his cause to be right, and that when once the people are thoroughly determined to assert themselvs there is no power under the heavens to stop them.

The other case was that of a Jew named Salomans, who was elected in 1851 from Greenwich. From the oath of objurgation he omitted the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." He was denied his seat. He afterward, however, made an effort to regain it, and was removed by the sergeant-at-arms. An enabling act was passed by both Houses permitting this Jew to take his seat. The Parliament that permits a Jew to sit in judgment with them cannot refuse to Bradlaugh the same right. Like Wilkes, Bradlaugh will gain a victory over the Parliament in the end, and the day of humiliation is not far off for the House of Commons.

MEN who are able to make discoveries are generally disposed to make allowances. Men who are eagerly pressing forward in pursuit of truth are grateful to every one who has cleared an inch of the way for them. It is, for the most part, the man who has just capacity enough to pick up and repeat the commonplaces which are fashionable in his own time who looks with disdain on the very intellects to which it is owing that these commonplaces are not still considered as startling paradoxes or damnable heresies.—Macaulay.

The Questions of Zapata.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF VOLTAIRE BY AVERY MERIWETHER.

Voltaire, in order to add sarcasm to the force of his thrust against the Bible and church doctrins, wrote these questions under the assumed character of Zapata, a Spanish priest, and pretended that they were translated from the Spanish by a learned doctor in Sorbonne. He represents Zapata as an earnest, faithful, and pious priest, who in the course of his ministry had his faith seriously shaken. In order to quell his doubts, Zapata presents the following series of questions to his superiors in the church. Instead of answering these questions the college of priests suppressed them, and the questioner in addition. These questions are contained in the centennial edition of Voltaire's selected works, published in Paris in 1878. Voltaire opens with the following preface :

"The licentiate Zapata, a professor of theology in the University of Salamanca, presented these questions to the college of doctors in 1629. They were suppressed. The Spanish copy is in the library of the Prince of Brunswick."

SAGE MASTERS:

1. How can I prove that the Jews, whom we burn by the hundreds, were for four thousand years the cherished people of God?

2. Why did God, whom we cannot call unjust without blasphemy, abandon the entire world for a small crowd of Jews, and then in turn desert the Jews for another set of people who for two hundred years had been still more insignificant and much more despised—the Christians?

3. Why did he perform a number of incomprehensible miracles for the benefit of his favorit people in times unknown to history? Why did he not perform them during some known period, and why do we, who are the people of God, never see any miracles now?

4. If God is the God of Abraham, why do you burn the children of Abraham? If you burn them, why do you pray for them during the auto-da-fé? How can you worship the letter of the Jewish laws when you kill others for following them?

5. How can I make the chronology of the Chinese, the Chaldeans, the Phœnicians, and the Egyptians agree with that of the Jews, and how shall I make the forty different modes of computing time used by the different commentators accord with one another?

6. By what arguments shall I prove that the books attributed to Moses were written by him when in the desert? Can it be said that he wrote them in the land across the Jordan when he had never crossed the Jordan? But I am told that God does not know anything of geography.

7. The book called Joshua says that Joshua engraved the book of Deuteronomy upon stones covered with mortar. A passage in the book of Joshua, and in other ancient authors, proves evidently that in the time of Moses and Joshua the eastern people engraved upon stones and brick their laws and their thoughts. In the Pentateuch we are told that the Jewish people while in the desert went without their food and clothing; it was scarcely probable that a race learned enough to engrave a great book had neither tailors nor shoemakers. How did they preserve that great work which was impressed upon mortar?

8. What is the best way to answer the criticisms of learned men who find in the Pentateuch the names of cities which were never in existence when those books were written; who find in those books a set of rules for kings, when the fact is that the Jews looked upon kings at that time with horror, and were not governed by them for seven hundred years after Moses? There are passages in the Pentateuch in which the author betrays himself, and which prove that he did not liv until long after Moses, for instance, "The bed of Og which can be seen to-day at Ramatha. . . . The Canaanite was then in the country," etc.

These learned men laboring under difficulties and contradictions (which they impute to the Jewish chronicles) should take care how they presume upon their knowledge.

9. Is the book of Genesis true or allegorical? Did God take a rib from Adam to make a woman? If so, why, then, is it said in a previous passage that he created male and female? Why did God create the moon before the sun? How did he divide light from darkness, since darkness is nothing but the absence of light? How did he make day before the sun was made? How did he form the firmament in the midst of water? In truth there is no firmament, for was not that false notion of a firmament derived from the ancient Greeks? There are some people who suppose Genesis was written when the Jews had only a slight knowledge of the erroneous philosophy of other people. Already I hav had the sorrow of hearing it said that God knew nothing of physics, of chronology, and of geography.

10. What shall I think of the Garden of Eden, which contained a river divided into four branches—the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Pison (which some believe is the same as the Phase), the Gihon, which flows through Ethiopia, and consequently cannot be the Nile that has its source a thousand leagues distant from the source of the Euphrates? Again it is suggested to me that God is a very poor geographer.

11. I would with all my heart be willing to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge, but it seems to me that the orthodox excuse for eating it is a strange one. God, having given reason to man, ought to encourage self-instruction. Does he wish to be served by a fool? I myself would hav been willing to converse with the serpent since it had so much spirit, but I wish to know what language the serpent spoke? The Emperor Julian, a great philosopher, asked this question of Saint Cyril, who could not satisfactorily answer it. However, he replied, "It is you, O Emperor, who are the serpent." Saint Cyril was not polite, but let us remember that he did not answer Julian's theological impertinence until the emperor was dead.

Genesis says that the serpent eats of the earth; you know that to be false, for the earth alone cannot nourish a person. As for a God who promenaded at twelve o'clock in day-time in the garden, and who amused himself with the company of Adam, Eve, and the serpent, he should at least be very amiable, since he was the fourth companion.

I truly believe the facts concerning the company which Joseph and Mary kept in the stable at Bethlehem. I should not like to visit the Garden of Eden while the gates are guarded by a cherubim armed to the teeth. Do you think you could gain an entrance? According to the rabbis the word cherubim signifies beef. Here is a strange door-keeper. Pray, tell me what is the true meaning of cherubim?

12. How shall I explain the history of the angels who fell in love with the daughters of men, and who conceived giants? It cannot be denied that this same tale is found in the fables of the pagans. But since the Jews, a very ingenious people, invented all these tales while in the desert, it is evident that all other nations derived their knowledge from them. Homer, Plato, Cicero, and Virgil knew nothing that had not already been comprehended by the Jews. This is part demonstration, is it not?

13. How much faith shall I hav in the story of the deluge, and the cataracts of heaven (which, by the way, has no cataracts) and the tale that all kinds of animals from Japan, Africa, America, and the southern continents were shut up in a great ark with sufficient supplies for eating and drinking to last a year, without counting that time when the earth was too moist to bear nourishment for them? How was it possible for Noah's small family to feed all these animals shut up in the ark?

14. How shall I explain to my congregation the history of the tower of Babel with some semblance of truth? It stands to reason that the tower of Babel was higher than the pyramids of Egypt, since God allowed the pyramids to be built! Did this tower reach to Venus or even to the moon?

15. How shall I justify the lies of Abraham, the father of believers, who, while in Egypt and Gerar, and at the age of one hundred and thirty-five, pretended that the beautiful Sarah was his sister in order to induce the king to fall in love with her, and thereby giv him presents. Fie! what a villain he was to sell his wife!

16. Giv me satisfactory reasons why God ordained that Abraham and all his posterity should be circumcised? It was not so ordained in the time of Moses.

17. Could it be explained to me whether the three angels to whom Sarah served a whole calf for their dinner had a body, or whether they borrowed one? How was it possible that the Sodomites wished to commit certain crimes upon the angels of God? The angels must hav been very charming. But why did Lot, surnamed the Just, offer his two daughters to the Sodomites in the place of the two angels? And what god-mothers too! They laid with their father. Ah! sage masters of the university, this is not morality.

18. Will my congregation believe me when I tell them that Lot's wife was changed into a pillar of salt? How shall I answer those who tell me that this is only a gross imitation of the ancient fables of Eurydice, and that a statue of salt cannot resist rain?

19. What shall I say when it is necessary to justify the blessings bestowed upon Jacob the Just, who deceived his father Isaac, and who robbed his father-in-law Laban? How shall I explain the circumstance that God appeared to him from the top of a ladder, and that Jacob wrestled a whole night with an angel, etc.?

20. How can I explain the sojourn of the Jews in Egypt, and their departure? Exodus says that they remained four hundred years in Egypt, but in making a correct calculation we find that it was only two hundred years. How could the daughter of Pharaoh bathe herself in the Nile, where no one is now able to bathe on account of crocodiles?

21. How could God make Moses his prophet without reproaching himself, since Moses had espoused the daughter of an idolater? Why was it that the magicians of Pharaoh could perform all the miracles that Moses undertook except the miracles which covered the country with lice and vermin? How did they change into blood all that water which was already changed into blood by Moses? Why did Moses flee with his people when he was aided by God himself, and had command of 630,000 warriors? Why did he not capture Egypt, since all the first-born had been put to death by God himself? Egypt could never hav assembled an army of 100,000 men, as is ascertained from the historical records of the time. Why did Moses, in fleeing with the troops of Goshen, traverse half of Egypt and remain just opposit Memphis, between Baal-Zephon and the Red Sea, instead of going in a straight line to the land of Canaan? And, finally, how could Pharaoh pursue them with all his cavalry, when God had destroyed all the horses and animals of Egypt by the fifteenth plague, and the country was moreover cut up by so many canals that it was impossible to use cavalry?

22. How shall I reconcile what is said in Exodus with the words of St. Etienne in the Acts of the Apostles, and with the passages of Jeremiah and of Amos? Exodus says that they (the Jews) sacrificed to Jehovah for forty years in the desert; Jeremiah, Amos, and Saint Etienne say that they offered neither sacrifices nor victims in all that time. Exodus says that they manufactured a tabernacle, in which was the ark of the covenant; and Saint Etienne in the Acts says that they carried the tabernacle of Moloch and Remphan.

23. I am not a sufficiently good mechanic to make a calf of gold, which, Exodus says was formed in one day, and which Moses reduced to ashes. Is such possible to human art?

24. Is it not a miracle that the leader of a great nation, while in the desert, should allow the throats of 23,000 of his men be cut by one of the dozen tribes, and that 23,000 men should permit themselvs to be massacred without any defense?

25. Should I regard it as a miracle or an act of ordinary justice that 24,000 Hebrews were killed because one of them lay with a Midianite, while Moses himself had married a Midianite woman? And were not those Hebrews whom we paint as ferocious a very a gentle race, to allow their throats to be cut for the sake of a woman? Apropos of the maids, how shall I maintain my dignity when I say that Moses found 32,000 maids in the camp of the Midianites together with 61,000 asses? That is two asses for one maid?

26. What explanation shall I giv of the law which advocates eating a hare "because it is a ruminant and has no cloven foot," when hares on the contrary hav cloven feet and are not ruminant! We hav already seen that the good book proved that God was a very poor geographer, chronologist, and physician; it has not shown him to be any better naturalist. What reason shall I giv for the many other laws not the less wise, such as relate to the waters of jealousy, and laws punishing with death any man who lay with his wife during the time of her menses, etc.? How can I justify those barbarous and ridiculous laws which they say came from God himself?

27. How shall I answer those who will be astonished at what must be a miracle, viz., that in order to cross the Jordan, which in its greatest width is not more than forty-five feet wide, and which can be easily crossed in a boat of moderate size, and which is fordable in many places, it is said that 42,000 Ephraimites were cut to pieces in the ford of the river by their brothers?

28. How shall I answer those who require me to explain how the walls of Jericho were overthrown by the sound of a trumpet, and why other towns were not destroyed in the same way?

29. Is there any excuse for the courtesan Rahab, who betrayed Jericho, her home? Why was this treason necessary when the sound of a trumpet was sufficient to capture the city? In what light shall I understand the divine decrees, which permit our sainted savior, Jesus Christ, to wait on that courtesan Rahab, which also allow the incest committed by Tamar, with Judah, her god-father, and also the adultery of David and Bathsheba? Such commands of God are incomprehensible!

30. What approbation can I bestow upon Joshua, who hung thirty-one little kings while he usurped their little kingdoms and villages?

31. How shall I speak of the battle of Joshua against the Amorites at Bethoron by the Gabeon? The ruler of all made great stones rain down from heaven, from Bethoran as far as Azekah. It is five leagues from Bethoran to Azekah, so the Amorites were exterminated by rocks which fell in the space of five leagues. Scripture says it was midday. Why then did Joshua command the sun and the moon to stand still in the middle of the heavens in order to giv time to finish the fate of a little troop which was already exterminated? Why did he tell the moon to stop at midday? How did the sun and moon remain for a whole day in the same place? To what commentator could I hav recourse for an explanation of that extraordinary fact?

32. What shall I say of Jephthah, who sacrificed his daughter, and who cut the throats of forty-two thousand Jews of the tribe of Ephraim, because they could not pronounce the word Shibboleth?

33. Shall I accept or deny that the laws of the Jews declare there is no place of punishment or recompense after death? How does it happen that neither Moses nor Joshua hav spoken of the immortality of the soul—a dogma known by the ancient Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Grecians—a dogma which was not recognized among the Jews after Alexauder? The Sadducees always rejected it, because it is not found in the Pentateuch.

34. What explanation shall I giv of the history of the Levite, who came upon an ass to Jaboa, a city of the Benjamites? All the Gommorrites wished to violate him? He abandoned his wife with whom the Gommorrites had lain during a whole night. He died on the next day. If the two Sodomites had accepted the two daughters of Lot in place of the two angels, would they hav died?

35. I hav need of your wisdom in explaining the 19th verse of the first chapter of Judges, "The ruler of all accompanied Judah, and he made them masters of the mountain, but he could not defeat the inhabitants of the valley, because they had a large number of iron chariots." I cannot comprehend how the God of heaven and earth who had changed so many times the order of nature and suspended the eternal laws in favor of his people, the Jews, was not able to vanquish the inhabitants of a valley because they had iron chariots. Was it true, as many learned men pretend to know, that the Jews regarded their God as a local divinity and protector, who was either much more powerful than the enemy's god, or much less powerful? And is not that proposition clearly demonstrated by the answer of Jepththah, "You possess that which your God Chamos has given you; permit us, then, to take that which our God, Adonai, has promised us?"

36. I add that it is difficult to believe there were so many chariots armed to the teeth in a mountainous country, where the scriptures say that in such places it was a great thing to even be mounted on an ass.

37. The history of Aod givs me much trouble. I find that the Jews were always enslaved in spite of the aid they received from their God, who promised upon his honor to giv them all the country between the Nile, the sea, and the Euphrates. For eighty years the Jews were subjected to an insignificant king named Eglon. At length God caused Ehud, the son of Gerah, to favor them. Ehud served them with his heart and soul. Having made himself a two-edged dagger, which he hid under his garments after the manner of Jacques, Clement, and Ravaillac, Ehud then demanded a secret audience of the king. He said that he had a mysterious and important communication to make, which he had received from God. Eglon granted Ehud an audience, whereupon Ehud with his left hand thrust his concealed dagger through the vitals of the king. God looked favorably upon this deed, which, according to the morals of all nations, was a dastardly crime.

Explain to me what is a divine assassination. Was the assassination by Saint Ehud more divine than the assassination committed by David, who killed the cuckold Uriah, or perhaps this was more divine than the assassination of Adonijah by his brother, the happy Solomon. Solomon must hav been happy, since he possessed seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines.

The Drink Question.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the benefit of your correspondent from Liberty, Kan., who, lacking a good reason for the drinking of spirituous liquors, is obliged to fall back on rattlesnakes, I will say that there is a better remedy for snake-bites than strychnine whisky, and that is simple mud, an article at once cheap and abundant in the West, even more abundant than that delectable compound considered so indispensable by many people.

Years ago rattlesnakes were quite numerous in this county, and it was no very uncommon occurrence for people to be bitten by them, but I never heard of but one case proving fatal. A woman died after being bitten by a rattlesnake, but it was generally conceded that it was from the effects of the brandy that she took by order of her physician, whereas all who tried an external application of mud recovered. So much for ardent spirits for snake-bites.

Evidently your correspondent thinks he has asked an unanswerable question of temperance people when he inquires where the poison of whisky comes from, "from the grain or from the air?" Will he be good enough to tell where the venom of the rattlesnake comes from, from the earth, wherein grow wholesome roots for the food of man, or from the air we breathe?

I would recommend friend Holmes so devote a little time to the very useful study of chemistry, where he may obtain some knowledge of the nature of poisons, about which at present he seems profoundly ignorant. C. L. MORGAN.

A Christian Hermit.

We are informed that a gentleman has spent thirty years in seclusion, from which he has just emerged, a white-bearded Christian philosopher, swinging the "sword of the Almighty."

We are told that nothing like him has appeared since the days of the prophets and apostles.

His advent is as sudden as the present northwestern comet.

"God passes by and proclaims his awful name anew"—so proclaims one of his disciples.

He has come forth to smite the scientists, hip and thigh, in the old-fashioned style.

Tyndall, Huxley, Haeckel, Helmholtz, Darwin, Mayer, and the rest of their school, may as well go and hang themselvs.

This hermit is a Daniel come to judgment.

The Gospel Preacher published in Ashland, Ohio, furnishes the startling news that he is "the Cyrus elect of the Most High to liberate Israel from the Babylonian yoke of scientific bondage."

"God Almighty has come down once more upon Sinai in fire and terror."

It is just awful.

The Gospel Preacher can hardly contain itself. It bursts out in joy, "The angelic jubilate that undulated over the plains of Bethlehem is not yet spent. It still quivers in the air. God has sent a new messenger in the latter half of the nineteenth century to pronounce with fresh and glorious emphasis the Deuteronomy of the gospel."

He is a conquering hero.

The Methodist Prostestant, Baltimore, imparts the cheering news that "thousands of the best educated minds will rise up and call him blessed."

The Primitive Christian, Huntingdon, Pa., says, "This man of 'seven locks' and divine ordination has taken the distinguished Infidels of the present day by their throats, and shaken them in the eternal grip of truth till not a joint hangs together."

That is rough treatment. It does seem to me that a gentleman who believes in the turn-cheek-for-blow doctrin ought to leave them their bones anyway.

The New Covenant, Chicago, declares that he is a man of "marvelous ability."

The Dominion Churchman, Toronto, thinks "the God of Providence has raised up the author to meet the wants of the church in this time of need."

The Christian Standard, Cincinnati, says the scientists will find they hav "caught a Tartar."

Let no one sneer. Since this wonderful Christian warrior has come forth from his cave he has already captured several college presidents, and many smaller fish among the professors and ministers.

Evolution is destroyed; the undulatory theory completely overthrown; Darwinism annihilated, and a personal God firmly reseated on his eternal throne, from which he had been hurled by the Tyndalls, Huxleys, and Darwins.

An old "white-bearded Christian philosopher" "in the cleft of the rock under the hand of the partly-disclosed I Am," has been raised up, at this stage of the game, to checkmate the entire host of blasphemous scientists. He has come not one moment too soon.

The American Christian Review declares that he is the "brightest scientific star of modern times," and has "startled the religious world into transports of joy and praise."

His advent is the most important event of 1,800 years.

He has already fought tremendous battles and won them every one. A pious paper, already quoted from, says the gospel of the masses among the intelligent to-day, throughout the civilized world, is evolution, no God, no Emmanuel, no heaven, no future; conscience an educated lie, responsibility a delusion, and the Bible a stupendous fraud."

That state of things has existed long enough, and so God has sent this new and very extraordinary "messenger;" "a divinely-panoplied and invincible champion of the truth has been providentially placed in the van of the host battling for God and the authenticity of his revelation."

What is the result? Sanguinary, of course. The Methodist Christian Advocate reports how he has vanquished the Tyndall-Huxley crowd, "met on their own ground, fought with their own weapons, and are hewn to pieces as completely as was Agag by the sword of Samuel."

I will watch the progress of the conquering Christian army, with its procession of one, and giv the news. He has already snuffed out the greater lights, and we, rank and file, may as well make up our minds to be devoured whole. Between Mother Shipton, the comet, and this last great Christian hero, there will not be much left for us to pull for the shore of 1882. W. F. JAMIESON.

H. A. LAMB, M. D., of Portland, Me., will represent that state at the Hornellsville Freethinkers' Convention, and will giv a report of the progress that Liberalism is making there. It will be well for the cause if other distant states shall be as well represented. H. L. GREEN.

Catholicism Inimical to the Republic.

The Rev. Father King, of the holy Roman Catholic church of the Immaculate Conception, in Oakland, in California, in America, on Sunday last, July 24th, of this century, gave notice to his parishioners that he would deny absolution to all the children of his parish who attended the public school recently built upon the corner of Grove and Seventh streets. Whether there is anything especially "godless" in this particular school we are not informed. To withhold absolution from a dying child, by a duly authorized priest, is to send the soul of that child to the tortures of an endless hell of sulphurous fire, from which redemption is alone possible through masses said for coin. We state the proposition; we do not argue it. We ask these questions: Is it right to send a child to hell for obeying its parents, who send it to a public school? Is that part of the holy Roman Catholic church represented by the parish priest of the church of the Immaculate Conception at Oakland in favor of the American system of free common schools? Will Archbishop Alemany, now that he is directly confronted with the proposition, support Father King, or repudiate him? If he does not repudiate and does uphold this doctriu, does he not thereby declare that the Roman Catholic church in California is the enemy of our public school system? If Cardinal Mc Closkey upholds the archbishop in upholding the priest, is it not a declaration that the church of Rome is the enemy of free schools in America? If the pope upholds the cardinal in upholding the archbishop in upholding the priest, is it not proof that the church of Rome is the enemy of free education in the world? If the Roman Catholic church is the enemy of free schools, is it not a fact tending to prove that it is also the enemy of our republican government, which is based upon our system of free common schools? If it, the Roman Catholic church, is the enemy of our republican form of government, had we not better keep the pope's political Irish, and all others who believe in papal infallibility, out of our political concerns? And had we not better begin now, and in San Fraucisco, and at this coming municipal election, by withholding from the pope's political Irish and the demagogs who work with them our votes? We commend this question to the serious consideration of all those American citizens, nativ and foreign-born, as one they will be compelled to meet at the ballot-box. We regard it as a political question which involves very important results. If a church so powerful in its numbers and its influence as the Roman Catholic church has determined to set itself in hostil opposition to our system of free and non-sectarian schools, it is a declaration of war against the republican institutions of the couutry. It is an aggressiv display of ecclesiasticism which strikes a blow at everything held dear by Americans. It raises the issue of ultramontanism, clericism, or vaticanism, as a distinct issue to be determined at the ballot-box. The first thing to be done in a civil war of this character is to ascertain who are the friends of the government, and who are the friends of the church—to call the roll, that all may respond whether they are soldiers of the Constitution or soldiers of the pope. It is well to remember that this is a government of majorities; that such questions are capable of peaceful solution; that if a majority of those clothed with the electiv privilege favor an ecclesiastical government, and the subjection of our country to priests; if they favor a union of church and state, in which the state shall be subordinate to the church, and the church take its direction from infallible Rome, they hav the right to so change our Constitution and our laws as to bring about this result. It is desirable to understand this issue, that we may meet it with the intelligent firmness that becomes American citizens who love their country, its government, and its institutions better than they love the church of Rome, its pope, or its dogmas. This is not a new question, nor is Oakland the only place in which it has arisen, nor is Father King the only priest who has asserted it. It is as old as the papal-hierarchy. It is as universal as empire. The Roman Catholic church can not liv in the sunlight of free thought and free speech that comes from free schools. It is only a power of intellectual darkness. It can only flourish in ignorance. It is a thing of superstition and bigotry. It has in it no element of enlightened progress. The country that it dominates is arrested in its intellectual development. It stagnates. The people become slaves to the priests, and the state loses dignity, power, and rank among nations.

A WEST INDIAN slave, who, amidst his wrongs, retains his benevolence, I, for my part, look upon as amongst the foremost of human candidates for the rewards of virtue. The kind master of such a slave, that is, he who, in the exercise of an inordinate authority, postpones, in any degree, his own interest to his slave's comfort, is likewise a meritorious character; but still he is inferior to his slave.—Paley's "Natural Theology" (1743–1805).

A Diluted Comstock Fails in his Efforts.

Another apostle of culture has got a metaphorical slap in the mouth, and has sat down sorely wounded, because he cannot control the reading of the whole Boston public. His name is Hubbard, and the men who hav smitten him are the trustees of the Boston Public Library. They hav decided that the novels of the Rhoda Broughton kind shall not be excluded from the library because they are exciting and sensational. Mr. Hubbard, who appears to be a man of Anthony Comstock type, except that he has a little more intellect and little less dishonesty, has for some time, with an utter disregard of consequences to his own sensitiv mind, been picking out and reading all the "racy" novels in the library and then writing letters to the newspapers asking them to use their influence to hav the objectionable works removed. After an extended wallowing in literary slush he became so noisy that the library committee of the city council gave him two hearings. He seemed to think that the clergymen of the city were by divine right guardians of the public's reading matter, for he says that he has "the right in the name of every decent-minded clergyman in the city to demand that this department (the fiction) be closed." Probably the *in*decent-minded clergymen of the city, and Boston has a good many of that class, would object to being deprived of their sensual recreation, and so Old Mother Hubbard only appeals to the other kind.

To his frantic efforts the trustees of the library respond with exasperating coolness. His charges, they say, lack definitness. He could not, as the critics of the Bible do, point to chapter and verse and say, Take that out, but confined himself, like Jeffreys Benedict, to the "tendency" of the work, with himself as a judge of the "tendency." "It is obviously impossible," the trustees sensibly say, "as it would be highly improper, for the trustees to exclude such authors as these, whose works are read in every circle of society, and which the public, who are taxed to support the institution, demand. While they carefully exclude from circulation, especially among the young, all books of an immoral influence, they do do not consider themselvs in the position of parents or guardians to the community, bound to select for it only such books as suit their own tastes." Moreover, they put truth against old-maidishness. Fiction that represents "a world of fair weather and blue skies, with no sickness or suffering, no vice or crime, would not giv a faithful picture of life." A novel which points a fatal consequence of error and wickedness is not, in their judgment, immoral, and leaves no stain on the mind of youth or age. Milton, who had no admiration for a "cloistered virtue," is called in to support their position. They hav probed the subject thoroughly, and they "can find no present grounds at least for the charges other than that among the books circulating there, as through the whole community, are many imaginativ, exciting, and trashy works, high-wrought, sensational, and unwholesome in their tone and influence."

Mother Hubbard must, therefore, seek some other city in which to work his high moral reforms. Perhaps he will come to New York and start a school, as that other eminent moral reformer of Boston did. He appears to be too good for this world, and the most appropriate place we can find him will be among the crowd of Boston transcendentalists, who exclude themselvs from the world and presumably liv on air. Such over-sensitiv people as Hubbard it was who objected to the Greek play recently performed at Harvard because it would corrupt the public, and who wanted the "Maid of the Mist" in the Public Gardens veiled with some more substantial fabric than spray.

We are glad to see the good sense shown by the trustees of the library. Let the bigots, whether literary or religious, be soundly rebuked whenever they attempt to foist themselvs upon the public as censors. These nasty-nice people are mentally unhealthy, and should be put in a mild asylum and treated for their disease. Of course the trustees of the Public Library could not do what Mother Hubbard asked of them. The library is supported by taxation, and the people of Boston would justly complain of the censorship so rigid as Mr. Hubbard would establish. If he explains that the books he wished to keep from them are corrupt and wicked, they retort that those he would leave in the library are stupid and dull. To refuse applications for this class of fiction at the Public Library would force the applicants to some other library not free, and they would be likely to raise a protest against paying further taxes for the support of a collection which did not include the books they wanted to read.

Progress in France.

A significant and gratifying step forward has been taken by the French government in regard to freedom of the press in discussing religious subjects. France has for a long time been a very inconsistent country. While her people are thoroughly imbued with skepticism, and the intellectual portion of the "upper" classes are Atheists, the hands which hav held the reins of power hav been fettered by priests, and the government has been in the interests of Catholicism. Recently in the expulsion of the Jesuits and now in the acts repealing all restraining regulations against Liberal publications, a clean sweep has been made, and hereafter no priest can throttle the press in France. Up to now a "commission du colportage" has existed which has sat in judgment upon the works issued bearing upon religion, much the same in practical effect as the censor who used to read (so Mr. Parton informs us) Voltaire's manuscripts, smile at his sarcasms, say they were good, and then suppress them. Under this commission all books against the Catholic church were promptly suppressed. There hav been indications for the past year that this commission was not very strenuously supported by the government, for it has pretended not to notice the publication of the works which these acts now expressly allow. Even an "Illustrated Comic Bible" found many readers among the irreligious Frenchmen, and now that an "Anti-Clerical Publishing Company" has been formed for the avowed purpose of printing and selling cheap works showing up the church, we may reasonably look for the further fast spread of the ideas sowed decades ago by the irresistible Voltaire. Any Frenchman, now that the colportage commission is done away with, may print and sell without license the best thought of his brain, even though that thought may sap the religious feeling of the people and undermine the foundation of that edifice of tyranny and ignorance, the Catholic church. And when the patriotic citizen of France reflects upon the monstrous cruelties upon humanity which that church has inflicted he can but feel derelict in his duty to his children and his country if he does not do all in his power to overthrow it. France, in times past, has been the field on which the battles of the cross hav been most relentlessly and bloodily waged. Almost every acre has been watered with the tears and blood of the victims of the church. Almost every hamlet has been lighted up by the fires kindled by religious love. From Charlemagne to Voltaire there was no rest for the heretic within the boundaries of France. Voltaire was the first warrior who made the church afraid. He it was who made even the little Freethought of the eighteenth century possible in France. But the work so powerfully begun by him has languished, because of governmental opposition, although going steadily on throughout the masses, until at last it has reached the law-making heart. Kings and emperors had first to be overthrown, because in political tyrants theological despots hav ever found most congenial and potent help. Under a republican form of government religious liberty may be had for even France. Let us hope that the priest may never again be the power behind the throne which shall keep in miserable degradation the minds of a people so prone to good as those of France.

WE see that the steamer Ethiopia, in which Mr. Bennett sailed, has arrived safely at Glasgow, and we hope in the next number of the paper we shall hav a letter from him. We know it will be joyfully hailed by his thousands of friends.

A First-Class Suggestion.

PALO, IOWA, Aug. 11, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would like to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that a thought came to my mind as I was reading Bro. Bennett's parting letter what a grand, good chance there is open while he is on his trip for every one that can possibly send in their names for the book, and roll up such a list of names that he will be astonished when he comes to see it. This, I think, we ought to do, those of us that hav not felt able to send in the $5 beforehand. We hav a long time before us to make the preparation to hav the money ready to pay for the books as soon as they can be published. I would like to see such a display of names as no other man ever had for a book. This would be so encouraging for Bro. Bennett and his worthy little wife all the rest of their days to think of. Now, friends, roll up your names as fast as possible, and let them be put in the paper from time to time, and let Bro. Bennett see what we are doing for him while he is doing so much for us. I would say before I close this that I would like to hear from others on this subject through THE TRUTH SEEKER. J. STRATFORD.

The above is a very excellent and timely suggestion, and is in accordance with our desires. We would like to see the list of donors to the fund (and consequent recipients of the books) very materially lengthened. It ought to be to pay for the trip, and we want to hav a thousand names to whom to dedicate the volumes. It will be five or six months before the first volume is bound up, and there is plenty of time in which to send in the names. Next week we will again publish the list, when we hope there will be many new names, and that before every one there will appear a star.

Book Notice.

"THE INFIDEL PULPIT." Lectures by George Chainey. Vol. I. Price, $1. Sold at this office.

There is no need for us to do more than announce this work. Words of praise, amply deserved as they are, are rendered unnecessary by the wide and favorable reputation which Mr. Chainey has made for himself in the Liberal lecture-field since he left the cramped and crowded church, where brains were at a discount and original thought not wanted. Mr. Chainey is a man to whom anything concerning human liberty is far from foreign. He thinks a great deal, and givs his audience all his thoughts. He is an iconoclast and builder, and at present is engaged in clearing away the rubbish that impedes the mental progress of the race. And he is capable of afterward rearing from the ruins a temple which shall stand the criticism of truth. His idea of the work of Liberals is well told in this:

"Liberalism has its isms, as you know, as well as orthodoxy. One party believes in destruction, another in construction. There is quite a tendency among many to be frightened at any sign of hostility toward the church. If you open your mouth against it, they insist upon it that you must be sweet as sugar and gentle as a zephyr. They seem to think that a pioneer can work with kid gloves on his hands, and that the church's dungeons of despair and high, thick walls of sectarianism can be battered down by pelting them with roses. They talk a great deal about the orderly sequence of religious ideas, and the work of a cultured Liberalism. Now, while I believe in culture, and strive each day to gain some, yet I am sure that to many this word means moral cowardliness and sentimental aristocracy. They shrink from the rough work demanded of the pioneer; and so, instead of going bravely to work, and by dint of hard blows making a clearing in the forests of superstition, they sow their seed beneath its deep and dark shade, and then wonder why it doesn't grow. The excuse given for letting the church alone is that it is not so objectionable as it used to be. But this is by no means so certain as many think. It is true that the lake of real fire and brimstone has been changed into a figure of rhetoric, illustrating the torments of conscience and moral despair. But, according to their own confession, spiritual joys and pains are more intense than physical; and so you see that this new charitable hell is a great deal worse than the old one. They no longer torment the unbeliever with fire and sword. Still, they socially ostracize him, put him under a ban, whisper slander against him, warn young people to keep away from him as from a pest-house, rob him of his friends, and insult his memory after he is dead, all of which, to a sensitiv soul, is worse than martyrdom."

The book contains eighteen lectures upon the following subjects: "Lessons from the Life and Work of Karl Heinzen;" "Minot Savage's Talks about God;" "Moral Objections to the God Idea;" "Nature and Decline of Unitarianism;" "Robert G. Ingersoll;" "Assassination of the Czar;" "Lights and Shades of Liberalism;" "The Spirit of the Press;" "Relics of Barbarism;" "The Sphinx;" "The Choir Invisible;" "Lessons for To-day, from Walt Whitman;" "True Democracy;" "My Religious Experience;" "The Ideal Man and Woman;" "What is Morality?" "What is Religion?" "The Church of the Future."

Lithographical.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I I hav received the excellent life-size lithograph of the good old truth seeker. It is a fine picture of our leader and guide, Mr. D. M. Bennett, and I hope it will find a place on the walls of hundreds of Liberal homes all over the land.

I don't know of a single face in all the world that I should prefer to hav as a household companion to this of our round-the-world traveler and freedom's champion. He has gone on a long journey, and who knows but this may be the last picture we shall ever hav of his mild, pleasant, and benign countenance? I hope all will hasten to secure it and that its presence in their homes will be as that of a guardian spirit that shall keep them from all thoughts of wrong and evil and impel them to earnest labors for the highest good and widest liberty for all.

ELMINA.

A GREAT many of Mr. Bennett's friends are availing themselvs of the opportunity to get his lithograph likeness, but we hav some more left. Orders filled promptly and securely.

IN making remittances our friends will greatly oblige us if they will send cash, drafts, or money orders in preference to stamps. If nothing but stamps are obtainable we shall receive them with pleasure, but we prefer cash, sent by registered letter so as to be safe.

WE hav sent out a good many posters to friends who are willing to make a little exertion in behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we hav several hundred yet on hand which we shall be pleased to dispose of in the same way. Let all who think they can obtain a new subscriber or two by posting them up drop us a postal card, and we will forward promptly.

Fifth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

The fifth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League will be held in Hershey Hall, city of Chicago, on the 30th day of September, and 1st and 2d of October, 1881.

All charter members and life members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues, organized in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, are entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National League are entitled to seats, though not to votes.

The object of the National Liberal League is no more and no less than: 1. THE TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. 2. Protection of all citizens in their equal religious and political rights. 3. The universal secular education of the people.

These objects commend themselvs to every American citizen as worthy of immediate accomplishment in town, state, and nation. Hence, there is not a man or woman on this continent whose dignity would not be enhanced by participating in this Congress for the furtherance of its object.

Equality before the law for all, without distinction of race or sex, justice for all, privilege for none, are the vital principles of human society. Any religion founded on these principles is a blessing. Any which opposes them is a curse.

The two facts, first, that a large portion of the people of these United States are not connected with or benefited by any church; and second, that almost universally, throughout these states, the property of churches or ecclesiastical organizations is exempted from taxation, show that this Congress is not less important than any ever assembled on this continent, hardly excepting that of 1776. If this is not marching to success, that was a failure. Let it not be the fault of the two hundred and twenty-one auxiliaries if it is not as earnest and dignified.

Boston, Aug. 10, 1881. ELIZUR WRIGHT.
President Nationa Liberal League.

Paul not Acher of the Talmud.

"The Origin of Christianity," by the Rev. Isaac M. Wise (Cincinnati, 1868), is a work which has afforded me much valuable information. The learned author proves that the writer of Acts was ignorant of the geography of Palestine and of the history and customs of the Jews. Yet out of the mass of fiction he seeks to save a few facts. Assuming that Paul flourished in the first century, and believing that the Talmud omits to mention no distinguished character of that period, Mr. Wise is very sure that Paul answers to Acher of the Talmud; and as in Acts Paul is an alias for Saul, so in the Talmud Acher is supposed to be another alias. Indeed, the meaning of Acher is "another," just as Paul means "little." But, in my judgment, all the parallels pointed out by Mr. Wise between Paul and Acher are very weak. He says Acher, like Paul, was a pupil of Gamaliel. Paul says nothing about Gamaliel in his epistles; it is the writer of Acts who names him. Acher, like Paul, had visions, says Mr. Wise. So had many others in those days. But in order to identify the two characters Mr. Wise has to fix the birth of Paul as late as A.D. 30, and his death long after that of Nero, A.D. 68, probably some time in the second century. For he makes Paul—i. e., Acher—the antagonist of Akiba, who flourished after the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, and who died about A.D. 134, at the age of 120.

Paul's last visit to Jerusalem is described in Acts xxi, xxii, and xxiii. The marginal date in our old version is A.D. 60. Ananias is high priest and Felix is governor of Judea (xxiii, 2, 24). Now Ananias was high priest from 48 to 55, and Ananus for three months in 62. (McClint. and Str. Cyc., Josephus). If, therefore, Ananias was meant, the year 60 is too late by five years or more, and if Ananus was meant it is too early by two years. Mr. Wise rejects Ananias A.D. 48 to 55, and assumes that Ananus was meant, A.D. 62 or 63, as Mr. Wise has it. But as Festus succeeded Felix A.D. 60, or earlier, and was governor only two years, Mr. Wise is compelled to drop both Felix and Festus from the account in Acts as unhistorical. Indeed, he avers, and truly, that during the latter part of Felix's governorship there was no high priest Ananias or Ananus. And the same is probably true during the whole of Festus's governorship. Other chronological difficulties stand in the way of Mr. Wise's hypothesis, as well as any other hypothesis recognizing the existence of Paul or any of the apostles in the first century.

Laying aside the book of Acts, let me point out one in Paul's own writings. How can Mr. Wise, who dates Paul's conversion about A.D. 50, reconcile with history this statement in 2 Corinthians, xi, 32: "In Damascus the governor, under Aretas the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me?" Does history tell us anything about a king Aretas, A.D. 50, in Damascus or anywhere else? We know that prior to 63 B.C. King Aretas of Arabia Petra did govern Damascus; not only does history tell us so, but there are diverse coins in existence stamped with his name and assigned to that period. Aretas had a governor there then. In our Greek version he is called ethnarch (ethnarkes), but in the Peshito, or ancient Syriac version, written in the language of that country, and the language which Paul spoke and probably wrote, the passage reads, as translated by Dr. Murdock, "The commander of the army of Aretas the King." It is evident, therefore, that Aretas exercised supreme and not subordinate power in Damascus when Paul escaped from the city by being let down from a window by the wall in a basket.

CHRISTIAN CHRONOLOGY.

"Why date an event from the birth of a myth?" says "A Subscriber." "Why write A. D. (Anno Domini) if there was no Dominus?" So he might also ask the Infidel or the Unitarian, Why do you recognize the divinity of Christ by using A. D.? Rabbi Wise ingeniously substitutes C. for D.; and now "A Subscriber" wants "Student" to change D. to M. There are two objections to that: 1. There is no Latin word for "myth;" 2. A.M. stands for forenoon. As an evidence that Christ was born 1,881 years ago (or, rather, 1,880 years 6 months and 21 days, he should hav said) "A Subscriber" refers to the date of "Student's" letter. Wrong there! "Student" has not dated one of his letters. About the year 1270 A. U. C. —i. e., from the building of Rome, which would be 527 A. D.—Dionysius, a priest, undertook to establish a Christian era. Finding in Luke's gospel that when Jesus was baptized by John he began to be about thirty years of age, and that John began to baptize in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, and allowing one year for John's prior ministry, the birth of Jesus would fall fourteen years before Tiberius became emperor. But Dionysius overlooked the fact that Herod, who, according to Matthew, ordered a slaughter of infants in the hope of destroying the little rival to his throne, died three or four years before the year 1 of the new era. So, in order to save the story of Matthew, the churchmen of later times hav had to set back the birth of Christ several years. First, they set it back two years (Helvicus's Chronology, 1687), then four years, and now at last six years or more (McClint. and Str. Cyc., Appleton's new Cyc.). So, then, it appears that Luke didn't know how old Jesus was by at least six years, while John took him to be near fifty (viii, 57), and Irenæus (A.D. 190) asserts that John and the other apostles told the elders in Asia that Jesus was an old man, certainly past fifty. (Agt. Heres, book II., ch. xxii, 4, 5). In view, therefore, of the fact that Anno Domini is at least six years older than the civilization of the dark ages determined, and that we hav all got to use some kind of chronology that will be intelligible, "Student" will continue to stick to A. D. and B. C.

HISTORICAL CHRISTIANITY.

The sayings ascribed to Jesus, which "G. H. B." quotes, are good, but not original; they can all be traced back of the first century. "It is a curious fact," says the eminent Swiss theologian, Wetstein, "that the Lord's Prayer may be reconstructed almost verbatim out of the Talmud." And the Rev. John Gregorie (1685) givs the old Jewish prayer thus:

Our Father which art in Heaven be gracious to us. O Lord our God, hallowed be Thy name. O let the remembrance of Thee be glorified in Heaven above and upon earth below. Let thy kingdom reign over us, now and forever. The holy men of old said, "Remit and forgiv unto all men whatsoever they hav done against me." And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil thing. For Thine is the kingdom, and Thou shalt reign in glory forever and forever more.

"Dunbar" charges contributors with "giving us excerpts from Strauss, Renan, and Taylor, without giving due credit to the authors." This I am certain is not true. "Iconoclast" (dubbed "Learned Man" by the editor) has once referred to Taylor's "Diegesis," and stated in a few words what the author had proved; and in my article, published July 15th, I gave from another source a brief statement of the treatment Taylor received at the hands of the clergy. But I am not aware that I hav even drawn on Taylor for a single point thus far, and I certainly hav borrowed nothing from Renan or Strauss. I hav no use as yet for either.

But "Dunbar" wants "Student" to answer, "systematically and syllogistically," five questions which he propounds about God. I beg to decline. The learned and eloquent Col. Ingersoll, as I understand, when asked, "Do you believe in a God?" answers, "I don't know." And the great Voltaire, writing, at the age of eighty, to King Frederick of Prussia, reproves D'Holbach, author of "Systeme de la Nature," for deciding that there is no God, "without so much as trying to prove the impossibility," and adds, "Si Dieu n'existait pas, il faudrait l'inventer"—"If God did not exist it would be necessary to invent him." So, then, with Baron D'Holbach denying a deity, and Voltaire claiming that "all nature cries to us that God exists," and Col. Ingersoll confessing that he don't know, why ask "Student" to discuss the question? Please, "Dunbar," don't! I am "systematically, syllogistically," and idiosyncratically incommensurate to answer satisfactorily the momentous interrogatories you categorically propound. STUDENT.

Liberal Encampment.

The annual meeting of the Liberals of Kansas and adjoining states will be held in Forest Park, Ottawa (believed to be the finest natural park in the state), commencing Aug. 25th and continuing until the 29th. The committee hav given much attention to perfecting every arrangement to make it pleasant and profitable for those present, and therefore urge large and prompt attendance. Friends from surrounding cities will make arrangements for special excursion trains for Saturday and Sunday. Reduced rates hav been procured over the F. S. & Gulf, K. C. L. & Southern Kans., and A. T. & Santa Fe railroads. The park is located one square from the depot of the K. C., L. & Southern railroad. Lodging can be had as reasonable rates. Meals, 25 cents in the city and at the park. A limited number of tents can be rented, but we recommend each family to provide their own, the cost of which will be but a trifle more than the rent. Vocal and instrumental music has been provided for the occasion. A number of distinguished speakers of national reputation hav promised their attendance, in addition to home talent, among which are Mrs. Mattie P. Krekle, of Missouri; Bishop Samuel Watson, of Memphis, Tenn.; Rev. Jenk Jones, of Chicago; C. G. Howland, of Lawrence, Kan.; J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan.

The following persons hav been invited, some of whom will attend: B. F. Underwood, Charles Sears, Sr., T. C. Leland, T. B. Wakeman, Judge A. Krekle, W. S. Bell, H. L. Green, Gov. Charles Robinson.

All friends of progress and mental liberty are requested to giv this meeting publicity by advertisment in local papers and distribution of its bills.

By order of the executiv committee.

ALFRED TAYLOR, President.
MRS. ANNIE DIGGS, Secretary.

Iowa State Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please announce at once that the First Annual Convention of the Iowa Liberal League will convene at Cedar Rapids, Saturday, September 24th, at 7:30 P.M., and continue over Sunday and Monday, perhaps Tuesday. After Saturday, three sessions daily. It is called at this time that delegates to and others desiring to attend the National League Congress at Chicago the following Friday, Saturday, and Sunday may be enabled to do so without returning home in the interim. Good speakers will be in attendance, and arrangements will be perfected as soon as possible and duly announced for reduced fares at hotels and upon railroads.

Delegates to the Fifth Annual Congress of the National League will be reëlected at this meeting, and much other business of vital importance will be transacted.

Cedar Rapids is accessible from all parts of the state, and there should be a large turn-out of truth-loving and light-seeking men and women. Let us hear from you all, and please do not forget that the sinews of war must be forthcoming if we would be successful. Let us evidence our faith by our works.

Fraternally, E. C. WALKER,
Secretary.

Bro. Walker in Minnesota.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Liberals in this section hav had the pleasure of a visit from E. C. Walker, Secretary of the Iowa Liberal League. This "brick" in the cause of Freethought not only scattered broadcast many Liberal books and pamphlets, secured subscribers for Liberal papers, but he gave us two of his keen and logical lectures, which, wherever delivered, will be a thorn in the side of orthodoxy. I hav long been an admirer of Mr. Walker on account of his efforts in the Liberal cause, but it was reserved for the present time to know him well, and we unhesitatingly say that for ability, determination, and unselfish devotion to the cause or humanity he has few, if any, superiors.

Should there be any change made in the chairmanship of the Executiv Committee, Mr. Walker is the man for the position. Liberals of Minnesota should arrange with him for lectures by all means.

P. UNDERHILL.

HE hath showed thee, O man! what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God?—Micah, vi, 8.

THOSE who hav read of everything are thought to understand everything too; but it is not always so. Reading furnishes the mind only with the materials of knowledge; it is thinking that makes what we read ours. We are of the ruminating kind, and it is not enough to cram ourselvs with a great load of collections. Unless we chew them over again they will not giv us strength and nourishment.—Locke.

Communications.

"The Political Aspect."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I see that R. H. Lamb has recently favored you with an article under the above caption, which proves that however much he may hav studied Liberalism, he knows little of Greenbackism and what it seeks to accomplish.

He says: "The Greenbackers hav nothing of which to complain now, inasmuch as there is money enough for all who are industrious, and the means of acquiring it are ample. The kind of currency is a matter of little import. The money we hav is good, and the people are satisfied generally if they only hav enough of it, so that, in reality, there are no good reasons why this party should be supported, particularly so, as there are now in the political arena three different parties, all of which present shortcomings of the real needs of the present. . . . Democracy and Greenbackism represent lost causes. We need advancement. The people are restless."

As they say in conventions, let us consider this seriatim.

1. "The Greenbackers hav nothing of which to complain now, inasmuch as there is money enough for all who are industrious, and the means of acquiring it are ample."

The Greenbackers do not complain so much to-day of the limited quantity of money as they do of the kind of money in circulation and the cost of getting it. But if they hav nothing to complain of now, why is it? Is it not because they hav poured their complaints into the ears of the people, and so thoroughly aroused the masses that our lawmakers became afraid of them?

When the Greenbackers commenced their agitation the Republicans had contracted the amount of money in actual circulation to about five dollars per capita; they had demonetized silver; had burdened the people with a debt on which the masses were taxed to pay six per cent interest; had dishonored the money of the government by causing the government to refuse to take it at its custom-houses, and had passed a law allowing the banks to contract and expand the volume of the people's money at pleasure.

Under the Greenback agitation the contraction of the volume of the currency was stopped, silver has been remonetized, the interest on our bonded debt has been reduced nearly one-half, and greenbacks are, in violation of law, receivable at our custom-houses.

Now, if there is money enough, as Mr. Lamb says, that is only a proof that the truths the Greenback party came to teach are working. Now, don't ask us to cease our work just as we are beginning to compel the old parties to do what we hav so long contended must be done. But does friend Lamb know that more than half of all our superabundant money is national bank money? Does he know that they never had so much money out in the world before? Does he know that they hav more money out now than they hav bonds deposited to redeem? Does he know that these same banks could at any time, on ten days' notice, by a concerted action, withdraw their over seven dollars per capita of money now circulating among the people? And does he know that that would bring immediate financial ruin? Is he willing to put the welfare of this whole country into the hands of a corporation whose interest is to bring ruin to the masses and thereby enrich themselvs?

Again, the industrious cannot to-day "acquire" the money; the means are not "ample." While stock jobbers, speculators, and gamblers are making their millions, if R. H. Lamb will come here I will take him only one-half mile and show him a hundred men, some of them building a new railroad and some of them repairing an old one, at one dollar and ten cents a day each. Is a dollar and ten cents per diem "ample?" Would workmen if they could get more bear the "burden and heat of the day" for so small an amount? Would lawyers, bankers, and gamblers consider it "ample" for themselvs?

2. "The kind of currency is of little import." That means it makes but little difference whether the people, through their properly-organized channels, issue their own money or giv their power to bankers. If Congress givs its power to make money to the bankers let it delegate away all of its powers. The power to establish post-offices and post roads might be given to the Star Route thieves; the power to declare war might be delegated to the gunsmiths and powder makers, and thus we might go on until there would be no further use for Congress.

The banks can issue money only on bonds deposited with the comptroller of the currency. In saying "the kind of currency is of little import," Mr. Lamb says bank currency will do about as well as any; in saying that, he says the money in circulation should be secured by bonds; and in saying that, he says the national debt should be perpetuated. Not any for me, I thank you!

3. "There are no good reasons why this [the Greenback] party should be supported." Let us see; were there reasons why our Revolutionary fathers should be supported? Thomas Paine, in writing in behalf of that revolution, asked: "Hath your house been burnt? Hath your property been destroyed before your face? Are your wife and children destitute of a bed to lie on, or bread to liv on? Hav you lost a parent or a child by the tyrant's hand, and you the wretched, ruined survivor? If you hav not, then you are not a judge of those who hav. But if you hav, and can still shake hands with the murderers, then you are unworthy of the name of husband, father, brother, or lover, and whatever may be your rank or title in life you hav the heart of a coward and the spirit of a sycophant."

Now we are in a new revolution, and I ask: Hav you lost your home? Hav you stood by and seen the sheriff take all you had? Has your all been swept away by the shrinkage of the prices of all you had to sell? Has your business been ruined, and your children been made beggars? Hav your wife and children been destitute of a bed to lie on, or bread to eat? Hav want and despair come to you or your friends through unjust class legislation? Hav disease and death come to your tenement or hovel and carried off your friends because of your inability to provide the necessaries and comforts of life for them? And are you the wretched survivors? Hav you been a tramp, wandering up and down the earth asking for the privilege of earning a living by honest labor? Do you in any way belong to the millions who hav been robbed by class legislation, or by any of the great monopolies the Greenback party seeks to reduce to the position of servants instead of masters of the people? If not, you are as yet unprepared to decide these matters, but if you belong to either class of the above-named sufferers, and still directly or indirectly work with the robbers who hav ruined the people, then you are unworthy the name of freeman, and whatever may be your rank or title in life, you hav "the heart of a coward and the spirit of a sycophant."

4. "Democracy and Greenbackism represent lost causes." What cause has Greenbackism ever lost? When our country was lost beyond redemption from any other quarter, it strikes me that Greenbackism saved it. When would the Rebellion hav been put down had it not been for greenbacks? And from that day to this what has Greenbackism lost? Indeed has not all our mischief come upon us from two causes, first from clipping the wings of the greenbacks, and second, from calling them from duty and destroying them? No, Greenbackism is not dead; it is the living and progressiv movement of the present generation. As ever, Moses Hull.

Col. Ingersoll and Judge Black.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Having read in the North American Review of August, 1881, Col. Ingersoll's and Judge Black's views upon Christian religion, I propose to make a few comments upon the positions taken by each gentleman on a few points wherein they differ.

First. The existence of the universe. There are two theories: the creativ, or theological, founded upon the six-day creation in the Bible; the other the developing, or scientific, theory, founded upon science.

The Colonel takes the latter, basing his arguments upon common sense and the unchangeable laws (or power in matter) that rule.

The Judge takes the creativ theory, basing his arguments upon superstition, supernatural laws, and miraculous power.

The Colonel denies miracles upon the ground that they cannot exist unless the laws that govern are suspended and held in check by supernatural law, and the power that produces miracles must be changeable, therefore not reliable.

The Colonel has the best scientists on earth to back him, and the experience of man teaches the fact that just as fast as common sense and scientific knowledge overpower superstition miracles cease to exist, though they once were of every-day occurrence, owing to the ignorant and undeveloped condition of man.

Second. The Colonel starts out, claiming a profound change has taken place in the world of thought.

This the Judge denies, and says it is a preposterous blunder in the Colonel, and not true.

Upon this point of difference it seems useless to comment, as there is nothing more positiv and true than that there hav been changes of thought, political and religious. Once religion and politics were united in theocratic governments, and it was death for a man to express his independent thoughts. Yet the thoughts of man changed to that of kingly governments, and still a greater change of thought to that of republican governments, where the governing power of the nation is vested in the people instead of a God. Infallible authority in the head rulers of the church is now denied by the Protestant world. The lake of fire and brimstone is nearly annihilated, and hell is not found in the late translation. Yet the Judge denies there has been any change in the world of thought. We presume the Judge remains in the belief that the earth is flat and stands upon pillars reaching clear down.

Third. As for the power and influence of Christianity, in connection with the religion held and taught by the God described in the Bible (independent of Infidelity), leading mankind to moral goodness and civilization, the Colonel claims they hav failed to do so in past ages.

1. The Bible claims God was the chief ruler and governor from Adam to Noah, and instead of the people becoming moral citizens, they became desperately wicked, and God was grieved to the heart that he made man. If this be true, it proves positivly that the influence of God's teaching and his governing power over mankind was a perfect failure.

2. From Abraham to the destruction of Jerusalem God is, in the Bible, claimed to hav made choice of Abraham and his seed, known as the Jewish nation, to whom God revealed himself personally, and was their special lawgiver, and dictated in all the affairs of the nation, yet his influence and power failed to lead his chosen people to moral goodness, and this attempt was no improvement on his others.

3. How was it with Christianity from Christ to Martin Luther, who introduced Infidel doctrins into the church, causing a division by teaching individual rights, denying and protesting against God placing infallible authority in the rulers of the church? This was rank Infidelity, and struck almost a death-blow against popes and cardinals in the church, nevertheless it had been held a sacred doctrin from Abraham down through all the head rulers of the church, and is so acknowledged by the Protestants appealing to Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles, on disputed questions as an infallible standard. We ask, Who but an Infidel would deny the order of God's church?

This infallible authority was held and maintained in the church down through Constantine to Luther, and, is to this day held by the mother church. From Constantine to Luther Christianity ruled predominant, and the result was deplorable. This period is known as the dark age of the world.

Here again is proof positiv of another failure to lead mankind to moral goodness. After a trial of some fifteen hundred years, Christianity ran herself into the ground, committing murder and all manner of crimes under the authority of the church. This is a fact that cannot be successfully denied.

All the improvements and redeeming qualities in Christianity leading to the elevation of man in moral goodness had their origin in that which is called Infidelity, first taught by Luther and his co-laborers in denying infallible authority in the church; second, by claiming individual rights, which lead to religious toleration, in the absence of which tyranny rules with the predominant party.

Therefore Infidelity should be respected for what it has done, and for what it is now doing; first, for dividing the Catholic or mother church. To this alone we are indebted for our present religious liberty. Had Christianity remained a unit we would now be under pope rule. Second, for causing and keeping a division among the Protestants. If Protestantism was a unit, the same as is Catholicism, the two parties would be measuring swords for the mastery, as in past ages.

4. The Judge in some of his closing remarks speaks of the condition of the world when the disciples of Christ commenced to reform it as being in a very immoral condition. He says: "In its mighty metropolis, the center of its intellectual and political power, the best men were addicted to vices so debasing that I could not even allude to them without soiling the paper I write upon. Cold-blooded cruelties, oppression, and robbery ruled supreme. Murder went rampaging and red all over the earth. The church came, and light penetrated this moral darkness like a new sun. She covered the earth with institutions of mercy. Her earliest adherents were killed without remorse, crucified, sawn asunder, thrown to wild beasts, and slowly burnt to death." Upon what the judge says upon this point we will make a few remarks, and then put in as a reply reliable history.

From what he says we think he misstated the time, from the fact, with a slight difference, if any, he has given the condition of the Christian church in what is called the dark age of the world, at the time Luther commenced teaching his Infidel doctrin, for which the church excommunicated him as a black-hearted Infidel. Murder and all manner of crimes were committed under the indulgences of the church. As for being burned to death with a slow fire, this was practiced in the church as late as in Calvin's day, who was present when Servetus was burned with green wood.

"The Roman empire at the birth of Christ was less agitated by wars and tumults than it had been for many years, though I cannot consent to the opinion of Orsins" (another historian) "that the temple of Janus was shut and that wars and discords had absolutely ceased throughout the world. Yet it is certain that the period in which our savior descended on earth may be justly styled the pacific age compared with the preceding times, and indeed the tranquillity that then reigned was necessary to enable the ministers of Christ to execute with success their sublime commission to the human race" (Mosheim's History of the Church, vol. i, pp. 30, 31.) From such history we are justified to look upon the period of man's existence referred to by the Judge (as being so deplorably wicked and debasing that he would soil his paper to allude to its crimes) to be a time of peace, tranquillity, and universal brotherhood. Also, on p. 33, Mosheim, after speaking of the various gods and religions, says, "One thing, indeed, which at first sight appears very remarkable, is that this variety of religions and gods neither produced wars nor dissensions among the different nations, Egypt excepted." This shows that Christ's disciples were tolerated at first and treated with respect throughout the Roman empire, instead of being murdered. Yet the Judge seems so anxious to destroy the Colonel's influence that he would sacrifice both history and common sense to do it. Not wishing to do the Judge injustice, Mosheim, on page 49, speaking of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, says: "They were fanatical and superstitious, while such darkness, such errors and dissensions prevailed among those who assumed the character and authority of persons distinguished by their superior sagacity and wisdom it will not be difficult to imagin how totally corrupt the religion and morals of the multitude must hav been. They were accordingly sunk in the most deplorable ignorance of God."

We admit the deplorable condition of the Jews, their God having failed to teach them moral goodness. In fact, they were a dishonest race, and had their foundation in lies and deception through Jacob and his mother. See Gen. xxvii. But this does not relieve the Christians from their doleful condition into which they hav run, and we deny that the Judge is justified in extolling the Christians as a new sun covering the globe with institutions of mercy, unless he calls the Inquisition dungeons, the gallows, execution block, and the stake institutions of mercy. Christians are entitled to the honor of these institutions and the using of them from the days of Constantine to the hanging of a Quaker lady and burning witches in Boston, Mass.

The Judge also says, "Take away the restraint of Christianity on evil-doers, blot out its history, repeal the laws it has enacted, and what would we come to?" Infidelity teaches us to do right and shun evil on the principle that it is best. Christianity teaches people to do right and shun evil for fear of God, his wrath, and an endless hell. Fear hath torment, while a clear conscience in doing right for the sake of right givs peace. Christians are the original authors of laws to punish heretics; and we say, Repeal them. All of our moral laws as a nation had their origin in paganism before Christianity existed or had a name. ISAAC PADEN.

Sequel to "That Stolen Rib."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With many others on the summit of this crisis, I am thanking E. Belle Whitney for reminding God's images of the origin of the customs, creeds, and statutes they sustain, and thereby enslave the peoples of the myth-ruled earth, and am moved to call attention to modern phases of the farce, and invoke action thereon.

While marveling that millions of heart-aching women are not pressing their thoughts into every club and journal, I am rejoicing that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a truth-speaker, spreading before the eyes of the world the high results of advancing Freethought.

While the Bennetts, Bradlaughs, and Wakemans, in their work against present evils, are quoting the Denton's to tell how very old this planet is, the Darwins to prove how long animal life has existed on it, the Hesiods and Platos to show the thousands of persecution-darkened ages since science dawned, knowledge glowed, and real law aimed at, blest some peoples for a time, the world should read, that it may think its way to action. The images and imitators of jealous gods should see the horrid sway of craft, and flock to Liberal ranks faster than Leagues can number them. And fear-suppressed rib-servants should rise in multitudes, form leagues, quote the Hypatias and Wolstoncrofts, and empower thousands of platforms with American Besants and Frances Wrights. The Margaret Fullers and Fanny Kembals of to-day should be teaching the fallacy of the old Eden apple-story, and all the cheats it has suggested to modern masters.

But what do we see? Lethargy, implying that the feminin ribs, pressed in, impart the defect of the old seed-rib to the heart, and there is no soundness in the system. Most humiliating facts and pueril conditions cover the nations like fogs from upas groves and mantles of leprous taint, and the images, like the rib-helpers, are afflicted.

Why this widespread stupor and reckless inertness? Because the early philosophers were slain by God's images, intent on seizing the gold and subduing their knowledge-craving ribs; because modern reformers are unheeded by the masses who dread the transition of tearing away from church despots and scheming misers. This stupid obedience is because of the property God's images hold in rib-helpers. Is this doubted? Why has creedcraft imprisoned true men for essaying to teach the laws of human nature, its needs, rights, powers? Foote, Heywood, and scores of extant men can answer. Why did fashion and fancy goods speculators bribe editors to ridicule dress reform and hire bad characters to put on and display publicly misrepresentations of the reform? Because their vile gain was in holding the weak, long-beguiled ribs to their service in making moving dummies of their bodies to show and consume fabrics and fixings that they dictated, set prices on, and receiving which filled their coffers, impoverished the masses, and deepened the gulf between capital and toil.

Were ever beings put to meaner use or held on daily treadmills by viler incentivs? Poor, tortured dupes! Deformed externally, displaced internally, diseased generally, and despised by those enticing them to the task by the assurance that the style will look pretty and fascinate dandies, who will admire them and coax away the little life the toggery leaves, the trained slaves obey, lest they be called odd, and none of the images of absolute rule buy them for helpers through all their rib-born lives.

Observers hav been puzzled to decide which bondage, church or fashion, was more potent in subjugating to sordid ends beings with such versatil and high possibilities. The soul-withering belief of decreed male mastery and servil helper, with her teacher, the serpent, is inexpressibly discouraging, but the body-wasting and mind-warping burdens of fashion are paralyzing; its sinister flatteries, its inculcation of milliner-made respectability, and the self-disgust it engenders in all who retain mind enough to reason, are degrading. It makes quite as strong a claim on possession of the rib by the images as the church; it strikes directly at the vital functions, it stimulates the already morbid approbativness by appeals to paltry vanity, becomes both base and dome of the success of the church in these times, and is not less malignant. Remove this support and every steeple would topple. It also includes the same relation of rib and serpent—the stealing under entrancement that started the plan is apology for theft and all petty arts; the instilling into the rib the serpent cunning of sly fascination by liquid eyes and scale-like glitter of ornate garb is akin to both, and the core of the licentious line strong in both. This is well seconded by producing personal semblance nearly as possible. It is effected by preserving the rib form, banding together and ignoring her dual propelling powers, and eking out her length with the covering, making apparent crawling ability by trailing extensions to the motion-confining drapery which the images long ago discarded, finding it the most petty sort of a coat. The crawling extension raises the dust she must eat, and altogether makes her just the kind of woman to bear dirt eaters and rib drivers. The rib idea succeeded.

These two institutions for running the world were once competitors, but seeing their effects similar, their objects mainly identical, they coalesced for mutual gain and strength. Their union forms the great remaining organization of the old fabrication of Eden, sword, and gate; God, image, and rib; serpent, apple, and repast. Images hav availed themselvs of full control, rib scapegoats for all sins, rib providers for all repasts. Serpents hav done much subtle teaching, and ribs borne pain and service enough to absorb their exuberant spirits.

The fable simply would hav been powerless and hav gone with gnomes and fays, but astute reasoning all along said, Practicalize if success is meant. And tireless effort obeyed, defending with sword to the hilt, and slander like scorpion stings. Practicing perpetual savagery, and sent on coercion, hypocrisy, and lust, heartless ambition and pride, the intermediates filled with frauds and intrigues that only tyrants and slaves can beget.

Hence vagrancy, robbery, and vampirism beset every avenue and vocation in life; hence sickness and squalor fill every city, cranny, and miser-made asylum; hence misery broods in every place called home; hence bishops' and misers' faith that their sway can be maintained; hence vengeful liberty-haters and kings of caste supply the inquisitorial espionage and cherish courts that are mere forms for a show of law in condemning. Without the horrors in the name of religion, the old sages slain for their truth would hav spread schools of science where the cross and font betray and crush. Souls wiser than Lycurgus, brighter than Eschylus, would hav turned that savagery, this barbarity, to happy enlightenment. But here we are, with dungeon and fine for stake and rack, with senseless tales of Adam and his rib whined into millions of ears weekly from costly thrones of mockery, built by the sweat of poverty, with our best society composed of aggregations of shams, mostly ancient, the modern colored with perversions.

And what is the work of to-day for those abhorring past cruelty and present corruption, those grasping truth, and formulating clear statements of purity and philosophy; those searching for laws of human nature, inherent rights, boundless capacities, and all-glorious justice?

Evidently to declare their codes, practicalize belief in all doings, thus change and rationalize habits and customs fast as accumulating numbers and the rapid mental growth of this epoch permits. None need fear they can go faster than evolution allows. It will take a century to set in order material ready for use if they work constantly at reconstruction. Practicality is not only what shows life, but what perpetuates. Theory may fail; the lore of ages went to the flames in the Alexandrian library; our literature may light the fireworks to please some incarnate fiend, if we do not fortify it by framing into customs our moral goodness, hygienic knowledge, commercial and social equity, our justice in all things. Truth lived into customs is test of faith in it, is fireproof basis for long time, at least; is imperishable certificate of performed duty to the present and future.

MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Mr. Petty Takes a Minister to Task.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I posted a copy of the following letter to the Rev. Mr. Balch, of this city, some two months ago in reply to a letter of his in one of our city papers on the alleged desecration of Sabbath, but hav had no response. Since then some of the Germans wished me to try and hav it published in one of the city papers. I tried three of them, and they all promised, but none fulfilled, alleging it would create controversy. I told them that was the right way to get at the truth, but it was no go. Please publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige J. PETTY.

La Crosse, Wis.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE REV. MR. BALCH, MINISTER OF THE FIRST E. METHODIST CHURCH OF LA CROSSE.

SIR: I was in the city a few days ago, and I had put into my hands the La Crosse News and Chronicle, with some remarks of yours concerning the German turners desecrating the Sabbath. You assert "that this is a Christian land, and with Christian institutions." I deny the assertion, and desire you to prove it. And you also added "that Sunday is the Sabbath and of a divine origin." Now, reverend sir, I deny that Sunday is the Sabbath, but affirm that Saturday is the Jew and Bible Sabbath, and not Sunday, as you assert. If you think so, let me hav your proof. Sunday is the priests' Sabbath, the day they hav set apart to call the simple people together in their churches to preach myths and falsehoods, and frighten them out of their money. You stated in your church, also, "that there might be secured three thousand Christians in this city to put down this unlawful and alarming degradation of the Christian Sabbath." Now, reverend sir, you had better not try that matter by force, for if you do your three thousand will be very small against fifteen or sixteen thousand in La Crosse.

Why, my dear sir, what is the matter with you and your God that he does not come to your aid to destroy those German turners for desecrating your Sabbath? Is he asleep, or has he gone on a long journey? or has he winked up on the slaughtering business? You added also that New York city is as full of the devil as La Crosse, but that a small number of united and determined Christians had prevented the enactment of the crucifixion." Why, if that is the case, it must be a certainty that your god-trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three in one, hav died and lost their former power, and that he abandoned himself when he cried, "Why hast thou forsaken me, God?" and then died, and that the devil has got away ahead.

Well, I am glad of it, for I think the devil is far the best boss of the two, and the most respectable gentleman, if what your Bible says of him is true.

You added in your sermon that you "will complain against the desecration of the Sabbath and enforce the law if it is not stopped."

Now, here again it is plain that your God is dead or has lost his former power, or why resort to puny, man-made law to defend him? You ministers or priests (for you are all the same to me) hav always been very handy to resort to the law when your God has failed to help you in your slandering and slaughtering work.

But it is my candid opinion, reverend sir, when the people get intelligence and good sense they will cease to believe in your gods, ghosts, devils, damnation, and a hell. The church will then become bankrupt and hav to hang out a shingle, with the inscription, "Suspended for the want of raw material."

Now, reverend sir, do you believe in the doctrin

> "That hell is crammed
> With infants damned
> Without a day of grace?"

For, if so, your ideas would be in accordance with the character of your Bible God.

But I will close by saying that, if you should bestow an explanation to these few remarks and remove the difficulties, you may perhaps knock the gum out of my gummed-up eyes so that I will see my error, and so become a convert to your faith and join your church. Who knows? Paul, you know says, "Come, let us reason together and hold fast that which is good."

I am, with due respect, your well-wisher,

La Crosse, Wis. J. PETTY.

Letters from Friends.

UNION CITY, MICH., une 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please nd order for $1.50, to apply on payment for my paper. Considering the department of "Letters from Friends" interesting and instructiv, and wishing to contribute something to the same, I, although unused to writing letters for publication, send these few lines. I will now try to write, and short letters are no doubt the most acceptable, wi i try to be brief.

For a little over a year I hav been a constant and interested reader of your paper, and I find that it is a truth seeker not only in name but in fact. It was introduced to me through the courtesy of a neighbor, and on perusal of the first copy I at once pronounced it the best paper by far that I had ever got hold of. In point of logic, miscellaneous news, and valuable information it is unsurpassed. Had I known of its existence before I should hav been a patron earlier. It is just the thing, it seems to me, for the times and conditions, and just th thing to open the eyes and understandings of the people and eradicate that huge theological delusion emanating from those absurd and antiquated dogmas of the early Christians, all of which I believe had their origin in heathen mythology—in pagan darkness—in the dark and superstitious ages of old. And they are certainly far better adapted to those ages than to this age of comparativ light and reason. As it is, it seems to me high time that such palpably absurd teachings should be denounced, repudiated, and utterly blotted out of existence, for the world has mainly outgrown them. Within the last two years I hav had the privilege and pleasure of attending in this town three courses of lectures by Prof. B. F. Underwood. I thought him the deepest reasoner I had ever listened to, and the effect upon myself was that my former faith (always rather weak) in regard to the authenticity and reliability of that old Asiatic book labeled the Holy Bible was very much staggered. Universalism had been my favorit nearly all my life (and I am now past three-score), but now, having heard those Underwood lectures and read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year, I must confess that I am pretty thoroughly converted o Liberalism.

And now, friend Bennett, in regard to your "round-the-world trip." At first the proposition did not meet my approbation, as I thought you could do more good here at home, but upon a little reflection I decided in favor of it, for I am fully persuaded that whatever deterioration THE TRUTH SEEKER may suffer in your absence will be more than compensated for by your interesting and instructiv letters. The merit of your European letters last summer is ample guarantee for this conclusion. I read them with interest and profit, and my wonder then was and still is how you could accomplish so much mental and physical labor, and do it so well, within the short time allotted you. Surely, friend Bennett, you must be especially and extraordinarily endowed by nature for the grand work in which you are engaged. But I see that my short letter has run to a greater length already than I had intended, so I will close, assuring you, brother Bennett, that in the name of humanity my best wishes and my fervent prayers shall accompany you on your circumnavigation for your health, pleasure, success, and safe return to "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Yours truly, M. BURLINGAME.

WALTHAM, MASS.

D. M. BENNETT: I send you a money order for five dollars, for your trip. I meant to hav sent it before, but kept procrastinating; so I will make up for it by sending four dollars for the paper a year while you are gone. Yours, GEO. B. HAYWORTH.

PAOLA, KAN., June 15, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I see by the last number or two of your paper that you hav concluded to make the trip around the world for the benefit of your friends. I am truly glad that you have consented to comply with the wishes of so many Liberals, though I fear that many more, including myself, will miss your forcible letters to Mr. Mair. Mr. Mair seems to think that you don't furnish him with material to work on. I think that if he will examin your sixteenth letter he will find a few nuts to crack that will require some labor to open satisfactorily to a thinking mind. I hav almost changed my mind. I used to think everything came by chance, or by certain inherent laws in matter, but since you hav concluded to circumnavigate this globe I hav concluded, or almost concluded, that it was foreordained that you should do so. Who thought when you were sent to prison that it would be the means of sending you around the world to write a history that poor, benighted beings might become enlightened? How mysterious are the ways of the Lord!

Inclosed find post-office order for five dollars, for your trip around the world.

Hoping you may always meet with friends, I am
Yours fraternally, DR. W. WALTERS.

LAKE VIEW, NEV., June 11, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: When it was first proposed that your patrons furnish the means to enable you to take a trip around the world I wrote you that I would take one share of the stock. But it appears that you took no notice of it, as my name is not in the published list. But whether you publish my name or not you will find inclosed post-office order for $7.50, five of which is to aid you in your trip around the world. nd for the balance you will please send me a copy of "The Infidel Abroad," and one dollar's worth of T. B. Wakeman's pamphlet, "Liberty and Purity."

Hoping you will hav success in your trip around the world, I subscribe myself your friend and well-wisher J. S. MARTIN.

BARBOURSVILLE, June 25, 1881.

MR D. M. BENNETT: I cannot bear the thought of being in your debt for the glorious TRUTH SEEKER while you are off on your journey, so please place to my credit the amount within. I think all should make it a point to square up with you before you start on your long and perilous journey. May good health attend you.

With due regard, EDGAR BURNSIDE.

NELIGH, NEB., June 23, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Excuse me for not being on deck with my stamps before this. I inclose post-office order for eight dollars, three of which apply on my subsbription and five on your trip around the world.

If you can conveniently I wish you would make a collection of relics while in the Holy Land, such as a chip from the cross of Immanuel J. Christ, a brick from the tower of Babel, a tooth from Jonah's whale, a hinge from the ark of the covenant, and a door knob from Solomon's temple. If you fail to find those interesting relics, of course I will be satisfied with your volumes of travel.

Can you giv me the address of any Liberal publication adapted to the wants of children? I want something that will take the place of this Sunday-school trash. It is high time that we hav literature of this kind in the field for our children to read—something that is suited to their comprehension and not filled with vile religious nonsense and superstition. I hav two little girls and I want books suitable to their age, but of a Liberal nature, to place in their hands.

May you hav a pleasant voyage and a safe and speedy return, and should you run short of funds draw for five dollars more on

Yours truly, G. F. WINK.

[Miss. Wixon's "Apples of Gold," price $1,50, and Dr, Foote's "Science in Story," price $2.00, are admirbly adapted to young minds. A little story by Jennie B. Browne, published at this office, entitled, "Little Red Mittens," is also a pleasing tale for children. We will forward either of the above upon application.—ED. T. S.]

VERNON, IND., June 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: So thee is going to ake that contemplated trip round the world. My best wishes and peace go with thee, and may thee hav a pleasant trip and a safe return to thy home and many true friends. I hav been one of the number who did not want thee to go at this time, as I felt thee was needed here. Bro. Lynn and Sister Parkhurst spoke my sentiments long ago. I will want the book when it is published. I hav enjoyed THE TRUTH SEEKER very much during the past year, and am now taking Geo. Chainey's lectures also, which are indeed a feast for the mind.

I see by my tab that my subscription is out, so inclosed is money order for $3 to keep the paper moving westward another year. Now in conclusion I want to say to your many readers that I am Liberal enough for any of you. Yours for universal mental liberty, ANNA H. HANNA.

FRESNO FLATS, CAL., June 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is $10—$5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5 for your trip round the world. I will send you more as I can. There are some books that I want, but I am not able to get them now.

Yours for the truth, ROBERT LARIMORE.

WOLCOTT, N. Y., June 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $11 for the renewal of my subscription (two copies) and for your voyage around the world. Wishing you health and pleasure during the trip, I am, ruly yours, J. M. COSAD.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I suppose you are needing money to sen you on your travels in search of the north pole, so I inclose three dollars for my paper up to January, 1882. I am rather sorry that you are going to abandon the field of your greatest usefulness to do a work that a second-rate man could do. The clergy and their dupes will rejoice that you hav voluntarily put an extinguisher upon your usefulness for a time at least. A man of your general ability and knowledge should be at his post in the watch tower night and day. So much ignorance o'erspreads this land of many states and much boasting that I fear your absence will be a calamity to the cause of freedom to a great extent. The poor and ignorant human beings—the toilers, I mean—those who happen to get the lion's share of work, are working day and night for almost a bare subsistence, when machinery which has almost reached the acme of perfection is not allowed to scatter its benefits evenly. A large proportion of those who fail to get their share in the general scramble count themselvs unfortunate, and, in their ignorance, can see no remedy. It does not strike their dumb noddles that in proportion that machinery increases should the hours of labor be reduced. This is a subject that will hav to be discussed in the near future. Necessity will assert her claims by and by. It is only the stupendous size of the country and its boundless earthly treasures that hav enabled the people to ward off the reckoning day thus long.

Your last few letters to Mr. Mair are posers. If he is convinced or not, I think your readers are, that no infallible book was ever written or ever will be. The idea of a stand-still, unprogressiv book being adapted to the wants of a progressiv people and an ever unfolding world! If Mr. Mair receives a salary for holding and propagating hi silly notions he has some excuse, but if he believes the nonsense that he culls from that old Jew book, a well as from its latest offspring, his learning has gone to seed.

Respectfully yours, J. BEAUMONT.

MERIDEN, CONN., June 27, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find check for $8—$3 for my subscription for one year and $5 for your book describing your trip round the world. That you may hav a pleasant trip and good health and safe return to your friends, is the wish of JOHN MORSE.

WAVERLY, IOWA, June 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose $5 to pay on subscription. I thank you for waiting so long. I am poor and hard up, but I can't afford to drop the best Liberal paper in the United States for poverty.

Respectfully yours, R. P. MESSINGER.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, June 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Just allow me a little space in thy valuable paper to inform your readers that Cedar Rapids, the hot-bed of orthodoxy, received a thorough shaking up. B. F. Underwood, our noted lecturer, was here June 7th, 8th, and 9th. His logical reasoning left a profound impression upon the minds of those who heard him. The lectures, I will say, were perfectly successful, as well in point of pleasing the large audiences as financially. As a natural consequence orthodoxy has received a stroke of temporary paralysis. Thus it shows the subject is agitating the minds of the day. We need many more such men as Ingersoll, Underwood, Denton, Chainey, Wakeman, and many more too numerous to mention, to use the sword of reason against the nonsense of the Bible and against the oppressiv tyrant of civil and religious liberty in order that we may enjoy all the rights of nature, the birthright of every man and woman.

Yours for truth, S. J. H. WOLF.

FRANKFORT, MICH., June 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your circular card of recent date to the effect that I am in arrears a few months on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER is at hand. This ought not to hav occurred on my part. As your paper is one of the very few journals that I read, I always take it up and lay it down after a perusal with a feeling of satisfaction that you are doing a grand, good work in awakening mankind to a consciousness of the depths of degradation that the religions of the earth hav plunged us into. I would hav you assured that there are many, many—whose names never reach you—friends who appreciate and admire the efforts you are making and the effectiv work you and your journal are doing in liberating the honest masses from this accursed thraldom. And they will watch with hopeful and eager interest the long journey you are about to take in the interests of your fellow-beings; and if earnest well wishing would secure you a pleasant voyage and safe return you are already amply insured in these respects.

Yours very cordially, N. A. PARKER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I sent for five copies of "A Truth Seeker in Europe" the day before you went away. I sent them to different friends in Connecticut—one to Mr. Edward J. Couch, of Ridgefield, Conn. He is a highly educated man. I send you herein inclosed a copy of a letter I received from him. It is so flattering that I cannot forbear sending it to you. I send for five more copies. A. S. WHEELER.

P. S.—I would recommend you to send him a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"RIDGEFIELD, CONN., Aug. 8, 1881.

"A. S. WHEELER, ESQ.: Two or three days since I was quite surprised in being made, by mail, a happy recipient of a copy of 'A Truth Seeker in Europe,' which I hav perused a little, and find it extremely interesting, the author possessing an extraordinary faculty of elucidating his experiences to the reader which, I must confess, I seldom meet. I think I hav never before now met with any of his writings, but shall endeavor to become acquainted with them. The author is a man who thinks and then dares to express his thoughts, whether they are formed in an orthodox mold or not. Those are the kind of men to whom I say, Amen. We hav altogether too much of the conventional way of thinking—one waving the wand and all others acting in obedience thereto. Not so, however, with our friend Bennett.

"For the kind favor which you hav rendered me please permit me to say thanks.

"Yours truly, E. J. COUCH."

LEBANON, O., June 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see your notice of "Liberty and Purity," by T. B. Wakeman, and wishing to aid the Defense Fund, and also to help people read that they may hav knowledge to know themselvs, I send you a dollar for the pamphlets. I cannot help doing it whether I hav the money to spare or not, or whether it is my choice or not. Now friend Ma says, I could if I chose. But that if is there. Now want to say a word on this choose in my own awkw rd way. No person has the choice where he will be orn, whether in India, Africa, and America; he does not organize himself, therefore his destiny is partly before he is born, and with his organization, education, and surroundings he is forced to do just what he does do, and without any "ifs" about it, for attraction and repulsion govern the universe and all that pertains thereto. Does it not? Then, if so, every one with his organization, which I presume is the product of his will, energy, and propensities, is that which forces him along. I might write more on this, but you hav my idea; giv it to the people if you think best. That is my choice, if I hav any. But I do not think the world will let me hav my choice, or I would not be forced to stay among so many selfish, bigoted sectarians.

Mair, I should judge, had rather a hard job on hand. I was pleased to hear of the dedication and decoration of Paine's monument. I worked on both those farms before the monument was up, but hav never been there since.

I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER some one gave his ideas of your book of travels abroad: "I had intended to write of it when I wrote you last, but can only think of one thing at a time, and hardly that now. Infidel. I will not claim that name. People may call me that, but the greatest Infidels, in my opinion, are the so-called Christians, for I do not think at this day of knowledge they can believe what they profess to." So I think it best to change the name to those who most deserve it. I do it all the time. I do do not know as it would be best to alter it now, but it was always re; ulsiv to me. But still, as that friend said, if I recollect, he could hav got more to read it had its title been different. But enough, for I don't know how you can keep up with things. You must go on wheels; you will whirl round the world on wheels. My hope is that you may whirl round safe, and, if we still survive, I hope to be with you to keep the wheels rolling.

AARON EVANS.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, June 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav read and had serious thought in regard to your intended 'journey around the world. I am sorry I hav no five's to put my name to the list, if I had I would say, S ay a home and attend to your paper. For a man at your time of life to undertake such a journey seems to me out of all reason, to go through different climates as you will hav to; it will be trying to your constitution, also it will be a sad trial for Mrs. Bennett, more so, I think, than when you were in the power of Christ, at Albany; but if it is that you do go, I hope you will be healthy and enjoy your trip, and liv to return and publish the scenes of your travels. Of course you cannot load yourself with all the various relics of that old Jew country, such as a piece of salt of Mrs. Lot, and a bar of the gate that old S mpson packed off, and a piece of the old flat-boat that Noah left on the top of Mount Ararat. You must find out what all his animals lived on after the old cuss turned them out, as you see the water was on all the land so long it killed all the grass and trees and brush, in fact, everything; there would be no feed for old Noah's birds, no, not even his canary birds and jackdaws.

Well, Mr. Bennett, I do not very often see anything in your paper from Utah, where the Bible God's true apostles and prophets reside, with the rest of the small fry. I shall not think you hav completed the circuit without seeing Utah, for I can assure you there are a vast number of the ends of the earth in Utah, and most of the natural scenery is sumblime. And you may tell the irrepressible Anthony Comstock and Joe Cook, if they wish their nasty names nrolled with the saints of latter days, the Zion of Utah is the place to come to God's prophet and mouthpiece. Old Taylor would receive them with open arms, and ordain the holy pair to be great apostles. Then they could feast their eyes in the holy harems of God's chosen servants.

Well, I must close with wishing you well, and success to the fearless TRUTH SEEKER, and that its army of subscribers may still increase; and that all people may throw off the infernal dark pall and humbug of priestcraft and cultivate their own reason instead, is my sincere wish. A Freethinker,

WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

CLARA, PA., July 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav watched the progress of the plan for sending you around the world. I hav not offered to contribute to the fund herebefore for the reason that I hoped you would not go, as I think your efforts are all needed on the side of Freethought in our own country. My other reasons were well expressed by Grace L. Parkhurst and others. However, I will not say anything farther, as it is useless to argue a case after it is decided. So I bow to the decision of the majority. Since you are going, I wish to contribute my mite toward making it a success. Inclosed you will find money order for eight dollars, three dollars of which apply to my subscription, and the other five to the circumnavigation fund. I am sure that in no country will you find a more contemptible hypocrit than Anthony Comstock, or any court where honor, justice, and fair play are more grossly outraged than they were on your trial before the Christian Judge Benedict. With best wishes for your safe return, I remain,

Most sincerly yours, J. L. ALLEN.

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y.

BRO. BENNETT: I write you a plain statement of facts, showing the fervent and undying love of our Close Communion Baptist church-members toward those of their brothers who are rational enough to think for themselvs and hence hav come to the sensible conclusion that there is just a little more heaven outside of their close communion than inside.

The story runs thus:

We hav at this place a Close Communion Baptist's society, which has from time immemorial taken up squatter's claims on this part of God's supposed heritage, claiming not only the right by discovery and possession, but also by adoption. Hence the members regard all new-comers with the eye of suspicion, and if perchance they are found upon acquaintance to be tinctured in the least with that reprehensible essence, reason, he is at once regarded as a trespasser, not worthy of the least consideration or respect from the sq tter colony above mentioned. To illustrate: I moved into this place some eleven years ago and found this society well established here, their rights there being none to dispute. They laid claim to the district school-house to hold their meetings in, and not only on Sundays but on week-days for conference meetings, and I think that on a few occasions the day or district school was closed to accommodate the Lord's people. Revivals were not unfrequent, lasting from four to six weeks at a time, using the wood furnished by the school district, which, however, took no stock in their solemn conclaves. As time sped by, others were added to their church membership, until at length the house became too small for them. Prosperity favored a few, who became infatuated with the very laudable mania of building the Lord a new and more commanding chapel. It was finally built and dedicated to him. But mind you, they didn't refuse the devil's filthy lucre to help pay for it, even asking the writer of this for a little help. But as my old friend, D. M. Bennett, was at that very time languishing in a Christian prison, I felt illy disposed to comply with his request, and gave him nary a red.

Time passed on, as time always does, until last February, when George Chainey was announced to lecture at the Opera House at Salamanca. A few of us attended said lecture. We were well pleased with the speaker, whom we found to be a scholar and a gentleman. We engaged him to come up to our place and deliver his great lecture on "The Clergy" the next Saturday evening at the school-house. We thought, of course, that under the circumstances above related our Baptist friends would not nor could not with any justice or propriety refuse letting us hav the house. But here is where our generosity prompted us to expect too much, for the worthy camp-follower, Mr. Edwin Bonsted, who commanded the keys of the house as trustee, upon being asked for the house, inquired who this George Chainey was—if he wasn't a Bob Ingersoll man, and when told that Mr. Chainey was a Freethinker, a scholar, and a gentleman capable of entertaining an audience or filling any pulpit or rostrum in the country, turned with a sneer and said, "Doesn't he go back on the clergy, on morality, and everything good?" We again informed him that if such was the opinion he had formed of the man it was without a foundation in fact, and that after listening to the man and becoming better acquainted with him he would hav a better opinion of him. In vain did we plead. "The school-house," he said, "is no place to hold meetings or lectures in now that we Baptists hav got a snug little chapel to hold our meetings in. The school-house used to do, but now we think it is no place to hold religious meetings in. It dirties up the house and the scholars' books are apt to get misplaced. Even though you should not burn the district's wood the building must henceforth be kept exclusivly for school purposes." Thus saith E. Bonsted, Trustee District No. 3, Great Valley, and I now enter my solemn protest against such narrow, contracted, Close Communion selfish. ness by subscribing the name of A. F. ALBRIGHT.

POTTERSVILLE, S. C., July 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav read "John's Way," and must say I hav enjoyed it well. I hav sent it around among some church folks, and they like it well. I think it is within the reach of all. Every one ought to get a copy of it. EARNEST RHEIN.

LEONA, TEX., July 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I expect before this reaches you there will be no Mr. Bennett at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, but there will be one on the other side of the world doing a grand and glorious work that will not be forgotten for generations to come.

When I think of the crime and misery going on in this world it makes my blood flow with horror. What causes it? Why is it thus? It is simply because the people will not open their eyes and use their brains. But, as George Chainey says, they are more to be pitied than blamed. They hav been taught all their lives that to curse, not pray, not join the church, and other things was sinning against an infinit God. But we, who accept science for our religion, open speech for our liberty, see things in a different manner. The love of God among Christians is as slim as the rations of a one-legged soldier. Take away the law, throw aside the government, and see how quickly Christians would be stealing and robbing. The fear of God does not amount to a "hill of beans" when it comes down to the truth. Did you ever see a preacher that would giv you the last cent he had even if you was starving? If he did it would be because he was afraid you would not pay him for the next time he preached. But with Ingersoll, Bennett, Underwood, George Chainey, and a great many others working in the interest of Liberalism we need not hav any fear of these low enemies of human happiness.

The little germ of truth that we hav obtained was through working, not praying, thinking, not shouting. Would you rather see a person hung to hav him saved for the next world than to see him liv on? Christians would. We need something grander and nobler to occupy the minds of the people these days. The craving of the mind goes too far to stop at the teachings of the Bible. We must load our muskets with the best material we can find, and throw it in the ranks of those hell-hounds, and make them howl and pitch worse than they did when they were burning poor, helpless little children because their mothers were witches. I think the preachers would do more good selling eggs than what they are doing now.

Why could they not be teaching
Instead of that stuffy preaching?
They only preach for money,
And when they get off think it's funny.

Yours for the truth, W. A. DUNN.

Yours truly, R. R. HALL, M.D.

CLYDE, O., July 25, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Inclosed please find $5, which I did not promis you to help you on your trip round the world. I could not very well let the opportunity slip, trusting the old saying will prove true in this case, that the last shall be first. If so, I shall get my book first. Wishing you a safe journey, I will subscribe myself, COL. D. WHITE.

CLIFTON, KAN., July 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I herewith send you a $5 draft to help you bear your expenses in traveling round the world. Believing you will giv a true description of men and things as you see them in your travels, I shall take pleasure and satisfaction in reading the history you will giv us.

The Fisherman's Wife.

BY ALHAZA.

Low with the lilies there breathes a sad tale,
My love is going far over the sea;
When the winds sob low on the mournful strand
Deep will the grief of our parting be.

I hear 'neath the ocean a sighing tone,
The plaintiv murmur of many a shell;
And it suits my heart in its mournful mood
To turn and list to the rising knell.

I could wrap my form in a sea-green robe,
And gather pearls from the ocean's floor;
But the gem I love I shall never wear
As I weep alone by the wild sea-shore.

Then make my grave in a whispering dell;
My love is going far over the sea,
And low with the lilies I'll dream and die,
Afar from the knell of the mournful sea.

The First Article of the Methodist Faith Analyzed.

BR ROBERT SWAIL.

There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinit power, wisdom, or goodness; the maker of all things, visible and invisible, and in unity of all this godhead there are three persons of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost.

There's but one living and true God,
The rest are false, or 'neath the sod,
Except the devil, and don't forget,
If rumor's true, he's breathing yet.

God has no parts in Wesley's view,
And he is everlasting too.
'Tis only holy men can guess
The mysteries of godliness.

He's powerful, all-wise, and good,
And infinit, that's clear as mud,
Which boundless means, good Webster said,
Not circumscribed, unlimited.

Lo, the infinit God must dwell
In every place, in heaven and hell,
Since two things can't possess one place,
Then all is God—all him embrace.

He makes all seen and unseen things—
Preserves them 'neath his mighty wings;
Made sin and sorrow just for fun,
And everything below the sun;

Made guns and powder, shell and shot,
Brimstone and fire, to make hell hot;
Made alcohol as well as tea,
Disease and death, and misery;

Made breweries and whisky shops;
Made insects to destroy our crops;
Made serpents and the murderer's mind;
Made thieves and rogues to curse mankind;

Made graves, with hells on either side;
Made greasy grooves therein to glide;
Made snares to trap the souls of men;
Made fiends to catch nine out of ten.

This wise God all the fools designed;
This good God burns near all mankind;
This great God yields the de'il the kirk;
This perfect God does faulty work.

All, all was made by him, 'tis said,
Without him there was nothing made;
Then to hell with him who says old Nick
Begat himself by some damned trick.

To reason thus may be too fast,
For God may make things right at last;
All ills may turn to joys supreme,
And but remembered as a dream.

So if he's good all things are good;
All, therefore, since he made them should
Giv him the credit, glory, praise
For all their dirty, crooked ways.

If God is wise then all are wise,
For he made all below the skies;
Supremely great, no power of course
Could hinder his infinit force.

So he does every arm employ,
Whether to save or to destroy;
And every mouth is his mouthpiece,
Though they from lying never cease.

The devil is his instrument—
His time is in his service spent—
Assassins do his sovereign will,
And robbers his designs fulfil.

The godhead we don't comprehend,
To knowledge great we don't pretend;
That three is one and one is three
Remains to us a mystery.

But on this moral we insist
'Tis nice to be a Methodist;
For its creed proves since Adam's fall
God is responsible for all.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.
BY JOHN MESLIER,
A Roman Catholic Priest,
Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."
This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:
NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.
To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:
The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS are the marvel of the world.
They are dumbfounding the scientists and physicians, and making glad the hearts of the people.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE PHYSICIANS, CHEMISTS, AND ELECTRICIANS OF BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK,

GENTLEMEN: A little over a year ago I arrived in the city of Brooklyn from Europe, and at 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, commenced the sale of my patented Magnetic clothing, advertised and known as the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I addressed a circular letter to a large number of medical men in Brooklyn, in which I fully described the nature of my invention, at the same time pointing out to them the rationale of my method of cure. A few members of the profession accepted my offer, and visited me for the purpose of having my invention fully explained to them. Of those who came there was not one but readily accepted my theory of disease, and recognized the possibilities of cure by my method, but a number of those written to so forgot themselvs and their character of gentlemen as to openly insult me by the return of my letters and in other ways openly expressed their bitterness of thought by designating me a CHARLATAN and a fraud. This line of conduct impelled me to open warfare against the now universal system of DRUG TREATMENT; but knowing as I do that there are many noble men in the profession who are ever ready to examin and accept that which is really beneficial and efficacious, no matter from what source it may come. With this fact before me, I am constrained to call upon the faculty of Brooklyn and New York, and respectfully invite them to visit my Manufactory and Consulting Rooms, when I will explain fully everything connected with my method of treatment. I will giv them the names and addresses in Brooklyn and New York of hundreds of its best citizens, who hav under my system recovered from every form of malady known to Nosologists, and this without a single dose of medicin. I am, moreover, prepared to take a patient from every physician in Brooklyn that he has given over as an incurable case, and place upon such patients to the number of FIVE HUNDRED, a suit of my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, free of charge, and will undertake to cure ninety per cent of all those handed over to me, within twelve months from the time of putting on my GARMENTS, my only condition being that PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT bind themselvs not to giv or use medicin of any kind. I will sign bonds for five thousand dollars, to be given to any institution named, should I in the twelve months fail to cure ninety per cent of all their incurables under their several systems. I will also at once hand over $5,000 worth of my appliances to any hospital, free of charge, to be placed upon the sick poor in such institution, bonds to be given in this case also, that medicin will not be given in any way.
This is a standing offer for twelve months from date.
The following physicians may be referred to as having witnessed the effects of my GARMENTS:

Prof. CARMICHAEL,	Dr. ELTINGE,
FORDES BARKER,	Dr. THAYER,
Dr. DEMEREST,	Dr. TINKER,
Dr. CLARK,	Dr. TRUE.

The following gentlemen can also be referred to: Commissioner Garrison, J. B. Hoyt, Spruce street; Col. Bayard Clark, Judge Levi Parsons, E. Sinclair Clark, Lafayette avenue; J. W. Littlefield, artist; Mr. Frazer, corner of Reid avenue and Broadway. These, with thousands of others, hav worn my garments. Therefore, gentlemen, in conclusion I most respectfully submit that you owe a duty to yourselvs and the public to inquire into the nature of the invention thus presented to you. But knowing, as I do, that all new remedies for the cure of disease should be well attested scientifically by practicing physicians before being generally prescribed, I herewith offer you every facility for testing the same, and would respectfully call your attention to a portion of Professor Parson's lecture, published in Baltimore this week. You will therein see the necessity for your inquiry as to the position that magnetism is destined to take among the REMEDIAL AGENCIES now prescribed through your colleges. Hoping that you will seriously and in a fair spirit inquire into the nature of my invention, I remain,
Very respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

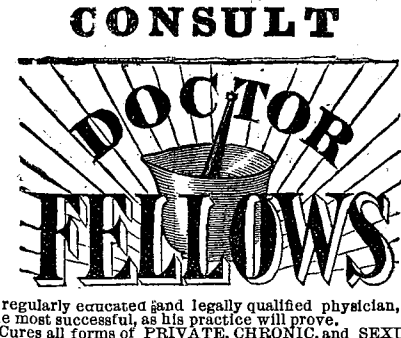
READ THE FOLLOWING PORTION OF A LECTURE. BY PROFESSOR PARSONS, AND SAY HOW MUCH LONGER CAN THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN RESIST THE INQUIRY WHICH THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM DEMANDS.

MORE LIGHT.

THE HARMONY OF THE SPHERES.

DISCOVERY OF THE UNIVERSAL PREVALENCE

OF A PRINCIPLE THAT GRANDLY MANIFESTS THE WISDOM AND GOODNESS



OF ALMIGHTY GOD.

Professor W. H. Parsons, a talented and modest gentleman, who is now a resident of our city, has made a discovery that is likely to be regarded with the deepest interest by men of science everywhere, since it not only explains much heretofore mysterious in astronomical science, but is calculated to impress all minds with more profound admiration for the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God.
This discovery is that the sublime principle of MAGNETIC REPULSION is coextensiv with MAGNETIC ATTRACTION throughout our universe. This magnetic repulsion has equal potency with Newton's law of the ATTRACTION OF GRAVITATION in regulating the movements of all celestial bodies and maintaining harmony among them all. This principle was first developed in the course of manifestations and experiments of Professor Parsons, who is an electro-therapeutist, or medical electrician, while making researches into the relations of electro-magnetism to animal life, disease, and death.
Without attempting to trace how far previous advances of science had prepared the way for the grand discovery by Professor Parsons to which we desire to call attention, we may interest our readers by glancing at the great facts in magnetic philosophy.
Magnetism and electricity—the one the manifestation of the other, with different forms of motion; the one vibratory, as light and heat; the other spiral, as demonstrated by the induction balance, each convolution possessed with magnetic poles—are neither imponderable fluids nor atomic streams, but forces known only from results, the direction of the individual force in each molecule of all magnets, whether in the blood or the heavens, being the opposit of the force in its vicinity, giving rise to a magnetic force, says Maxwell, of extreme complexity, but which, by its repellant as well as its attractiv power, works order out of apparent and really original chaos, and under law established at creation's dawn is the principle of all motion and all life in every kingdom of nature, either in the heavens above or the earth beneath.
Perfect polarization, whereby like poles repel and unlike attract and neutralize each other, whether in the celestial system, including our own planet, or the circulatory system of the blood and nerves, of what is as fearfully, wonderfully, and as curiously made—the divine organism of man—is the source and law [it is not attraction of gravitation, affirmed by Newton, or the undefined centripetal and centrifugal forces of scientists], but the omnipotent and omnipresent governing force which maintains all motion, all life, all health, and all harmony in the cosmogony of the universe.
The law (attraction and repulsion) in each molecular current, or rings of electricity, in either the circular corpuscles which float in arterial or venous blood, or the circular orbs which float in the firmament of the heavens, is the now manifest and realized omnipresent and omnipotent attribute of nature and nature's god by which worlds and all celestial bodies, including comets, are sustained in space without possibility of collision, and all motion, whether orbital or axital, has become the harmony of the spheres.
Its disturbance in the one is the source of all commotion, celestial (as solar magnetic storms) or terrestrial, inward, as in the magnetic shocks of the earthquake, or outward, in electric storms by land or sea. Its interruption in the animal organism whereby the ultimate electric molecules of the blood, tissues, nerves, and muscles, each with a positiv and negativ pole (recently discovered and announced to exist by Suettle Scoutellon, of Paris, and Dubois Reymond), become non-electric or demagnetized, in which non-electric state, says Reymond, these molecules are turned toward each other with like poles so that two become one, possessed of one positive zone and two negativ poles, and when in the electrotonic state unequal or unlike poles are turned toward each other. This non-electric or demagnetized state of the iron molecules of the blood, or the electric molecules of the nerves and muscles is, therefore, the source of all disorder and all diseases in the human cosmos.
I may be, and we believe it is, the law that the celestial strangers known as comets are magnetic regulators designed to resupply the wasted magnetic forces of the spheres they traverse in space, creating apparent temporary disturbance and increased activity in the magnetic forces of the sun, plainly visible in the solar spectrum, and due, says Lockyear, in a recent lecture before the Royal Astronomical Society, to the ejection of heated matter in the interior of the sun, the result of increased temperature and consequent breaking up of magnetic iron in the sun into simpler constituents.
Whatever weight is due to this theory of magnetic restoration of exhausted planets—illustrated in the increased temperature of the sun thus excited by the positiv forces of its late and still freshly announced celestial visitors—it has been demonstrated that the electro magnetic or nervo electric vital forces of the human organism can be uniformly replenished and resupplied and reinvigorated and revitalized from the very verge of dissolution and partial demagnetization of the ultimate electric molecules of blood and nerve by the truthful application of the maxim of the great German Esculapius, that like cures like, with the universal law of proper polarization, celestial and terrestrial, revealed and understood, man may and will control its forces; unlock the arcana of nature in all her kingdoms; stand within the veil face to face with the magnetic source of universal life and motion; and the preventiv of decay and premature death approach to comprehend with a spirit of exultation and awe the now revealed, yet still invisible, power, which, when darkness was upon the face of the deep and chaos reigned, moved upon the face of the waters, uttered the supreme fiat, and solar magnetism burst upon a primeval world, bathed it in light, and then as now, invested it with life and clad it in beauty.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complain in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 300 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."
Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Gems of Thought.

If knaves beguile by felon art
The shifting favor of the hour;
If civic rule from right depart,
And brazen impudence has power;
If low ambition buy his place,
While merit waits in half disgrace,
Still undecided sways the fight;
The bugle still to charge commands;
There is no truce of tongue or hands—
No quarter while one foeman stands
To mock eternal right. —Bayard Taylor.

IGNORANT and miseducated men often mistake the true path to happiness, and commit crime in the endeavor to obtain it. Atheists hold that by teaching mankind the real road to human happiness it is possible to keep them from the byways of criminality and error. Atheists would teach men to be moral now, not because God offers as an inducement reward by and by, but because, in the virtuous act itself, immediate good is insured to the doer and the circle surrounding him. Atheism would preserve man from lying, stealing, murdering, not from fear of an eternal agony after death, but because these crimes make this life itself a course of misery.—Bradlaugh's Plea for Atheism.

MAN, say some, knows God by immediate intuition; he needs no argument for his existence, because he perceives him directly, face to face, without any medium. It is easy to assert this, but obviously the assertion is the merest dogmatism. Not one man in a thousand who understands what he is affirming will dare to claim to hav an immediate vision of God, and nothing can be more likely than that the man who makes such a claim is self-deluded.—Prof. Flint.

REASON givs us knowledge, while faith only givs us belief, which is a part of knowledge, and is, therefore, inferior to it. It is by reason, and not by faith, that we must discriminate in religious matters, and it is by reason alone that we can distinguish truth from falsehood.—Chillingworth.

A MAN who has learned little grows old like an ox; his flesh grows, but his knowledge does not grow.—Buddha.

INFINIT goodness would desire for human kind the most perfect happiness, infinit wisdom would know how to obtain that happiness, and infinit power would be able to carry out the dictates of wisdom and goodness. If causes exist which impede mankind in their progress toward happiness, they must exist either because God does not desire to remove them—in which case he is not infinitly good; that is, he is not God—or because God does not know how to remove them—in which case he is not all-wise; that is, he is not God—or because God is not able to remove them, in which case he is not omnipotent; that is, he is not God.—Bradlaugh's Jesus, Shelley, and Malthus.

TRUE reverence does not consist in declaring a subject, because it is dear to us, to be unfit for free and honest inquiry; far from it. True reverence is shown in treating every subject, however sacred, however dear to us, with perfect confidence; without fear and without favor; with tenderness and love, by all means; but, before all, with an unflinching and uncompromising loyalty to truth. I also admit that religion has stood in former ages, and stands even in our own age, if we look abroad, aye, even if we look into some dark places at home, on a level with alchemy and astrology; but, for the discovery of truth, there is nothing so useful as the study of errors, and we know that in alchemy t ere lay the seed of chemistry, and that astrology was more or less a yearning and groping after the true science of astronomy.—Max Muller.

A FRIEND says, "The true Christian is always capable of living in obedience and happiness." Can we find an individual bearing this ear-mark? I've never met one. I know of no one capable of being always happy. And few, if any, are always at peace with other people. Always is impossible in these relations. No one is always happy, peaceful, or obedient. The spirit will fly up in rebellion to all that it warmly opposes. A real Christian is more and more an anomaly to me. Where, oh, where, is one? Echo answers, Where? —E. D. Slenker.

EVEN an evil-doer sees happiness as long as his evil deeds hav not ripened; but when his evil deed has ripened, then does the evil-doer see evil. Even a good man sees evil days as long as his good deed has not ripened; but when his good has ripened, then does the good man see happy days. Let no man think lightly of evil, saying in his heart, It will not come near unto me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled. The fool becomes full of evil, even if he gathers it little by little. Let no man think lightly of good, saying in his heart, It will benefit me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled. The wise man becomes full of good, even if he gather it little by little.—Buddha's Dhammapada.

CIRCUMSTANCE is not all, but it often makes the difference between the castaway who comes to the gallows and the highly respectable rogue who comes to reward and honor.—Toronto Bystander.

THE appeal to earthly rewards and punishments, says Lessing, is after all an appeal to our lower feelings; other-worldliness is but a refined selfishness, and we are to cherish virtue for its own sake, not because it will lead us to heaven. Here is the grand principle of Stoicism. Lessing believed, with Mr. Mill, that the less we think about getting reward either on earth or in heaven the better. He was cast in the same heroic mold as Muhamed Effendi, who, when led to the stake, exclaimed, "Though I hav no hope of recompense hereafter, yet the love of truth constrained me to die in its defense."—John Fiske.

HERE is no home; here is but wilderness;
Forth, pilgrim, forth; on, best out of thy stall,
Look up on high and thank the God of all.
Wei with [subdue] thy lust and let thy ghost [spirit] thee lead,
And truth shall thee deliver—'tis no drede.
—Chaucer.

VIRGINIA POLITICS.

SHE—Don't put your arm around my ne—,
You'll rumple all my ruffles.

HE—Then let me kiss you without force,
And thus avoid all scuffles.

SHE—There is no sweetness in a kiss
Unless by force 'tis taken.

HE—I know it. There! Oh, this is bliss?
This style of osculation.

SHE—My ruffles you hav rumpled love,
And put me in a fluster.

HE—Oh, never mind; I'll fix it, dove,
For I'm a Readjuster.
—Wheeling Ledger.

AN INTERLUDE.

There's silence deep, and a brooding sleep,
That over the drear earth steals;
And the gentle buzz of the June-bug's coz
Through the orchard and meadow peals.

At the garden gate, though it's rather late,
Stand a youth and maiden fair;
She is seventeen, and a little lean,
And she bangs her nut-brown hair.

The old gate creeks as Maud's blushing cheeks
Are kissed by two rose-red lips;
Down the garden-path, with a great big lath,
A stern parent softly skips.

There's scattered group, and a wild, wild whoop
And a swiftly-moving boot:
In the new spring pants see him madly prance,
And away for the street cars scoot.

WHAT HE MEANT.

A man who on the sidewalk fell,
From having a collision,
Commenced to swear and say, "O h—"
Forgetting the revision.

But when he heard a well-bred screech
From the lips of passing ladies,
He modified his opening speech
By adding, "I meant hades."
—Evansville Argus.

TEACHING HIM THE BUSINESS.

"Herman," said a Poydras street merchant clothier, addressing his clerk, "haf ve sold all of dose overgoats vat vas left over from last vinter?"

"No, sir; dere vas dree of dem left yet."

"Vell, ve must sell 'em right avay, as de vinter vill not last, you know, Herman. Pring me one uf de goats und I vill show you somedings about de pisness. I vill dell you how ve vill sell dem oud, und you must learn de pisness, Herman; de vinter vas gone, you know, und ve hav had dose goats in de store more es seex years."

An eight-dollar overcort was handed him by his clerk, and smoothing it out he took a buckskin money purse from the showcase, and stuffing it full of paper, dropped it into one of the pockets.

"Now Herman, my poy," he continued, "vatch me sell dat goat. I haf sold over dirty-fife uf dem shust de same vay, und I vant to deech you de pisness. Ven de nexd gustomer comes in de shop I vill show de way Rube Hoffenstein, mine broder in Detroit, sells his cloding und udder dings."

A few minutes later a negro in quest of a suitable pair of cheap shoes entered the store. The proprietor advanced smiling and inquired,

"Vat is it you vish?"

"Yer got any cheap shoes hyar?" asked the negro.

"Blenty uf dem, my frent, blenty; at any brice you vant."

The negro stated that he wanted a pair of brogans, and soon his pedal extremities were incased in them and a bargain struck. As he was about to leave the proprietor called him back.

"I ain't gwine ter buy nuffin else. I'se got all I want," said the negro, sullenly.

"Dot may be so, my dear sir," replied the proprietor, "but I shust vants you to look at dis goat. It vas de pure Russian vool, und dis dime last year you doan got dot same goat for dwenty-fife dollars. Mine gracious, cloding vas gone down to noding and dere vas no money in de pisness any longer. You vant someding dot vill keep you from de vedder und make you feel varm as summer dime. De gonsumption vas going round, und de doctors dell me it vas de vedder. More den nine beoples died round vere I lif last veek. Dink uf dot. Mine frent, dat goat vas Russian vool, dick und hevy. Vy, Misder Jones, who owns de pank on Canal street, took dat goat home mit him yesterday und vore it all day; but it vas a leedle dight agross de shoulders und he brought it pack shust a vile ago. Dry it on, my dear sir. Ah, dot vos all right! Misder Jones vas a rich man, und he liked dot goat. How deep de pockets vas, but it vas a leedle dight agross de shoulders."

The negro buttoned up the goat, thrust his hands in the pockets, and felt the purse. A peaceful smile played over his face when his touch disclosed to his mind the contents of the pockets; but he choked down his joy and inquired,

"Who did you say wore this hyar coat?"

"Vy, Misder Jones vot owns de pank on Canal streed."

"What yer gwine to ax fur it?"

"Dwendy dollars."

"Dat's pow'ful high price fur dis coat, but I'll take it."

"Herman, here, wrap up dis goat fur de schentleman and drow in a cravat; it vill make him look nice mit de ladies."

"Nebber mind, I'll keep de coat on," replied the negro, and pulling out a roll of money, he paid for it and left the store.

While he was around the next corner moaning over the stuffed purse Hoffenstein said to his clerk,

"Herman, fix up anudder von of dose goats de same vay, und doan forget to dell dem dot Misder Jones vot runs de pank on Canal street vore it yesterday."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 35. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, August 27, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE organ of the Vatican, the Aurora, has died a natural death. It never sold more than a thousand copies, and has cost Leo XIII. £4,000.

A MAN at Bangor, Me., finding that his eavestrough was highest at the end which ought to hav been lowest, hired a gang of men, tore out the foundation, and raised one corner of the house until the trough was all right.

MOODY continues his opposition to church fairs. When asked how to secure a genuin revival of religion, he answers, "Put aside all those distracting church fairs." When asked as to the best manner of training new converts, he says, "First keep them out of fairs."

THE Golos, the well-known Russian newspaper, has been suppressed for the term of six months. The reasons assigned are: Firstly, an article criticising the prince of Bulgaria; and, secondly, a feuilleton animadverting on the behavior of Russian naval officers when in foreign ports.

A NEGRO woman who killed two children near Washington is unable to giv any motiv for the crime, and none can be conceived, though she seems quite sane. "The devil put it in my head," she says, "and I couldn't help it. I see them running round the yard, and the devil made me pound them with a club."

LET the Rev. Mr. Jasper take courage. Printed tracts are in circulation in England in which devout men are informed that the doctrins now taught in the astronomical textbooks are of heathenish origin, and are invited to join a society for asserting "the fiatness and fixity of the earth."

THE Rev. Mr. McKechnie rose to open a business meeting with prayer in the Argyle Free Church, Glasgow. He had got no further than "Our Heavenly Father," when he was knocked down. A fight between two factions of the congregation ensued, and the house was at length cleared by the police.

INGERSOLL writes to Mr. Holyoake, of England, regarding the shooting of Garfield: "It was fortunate for me that the assassin was a good Christian, that he had delivered lectures answering me, that he was connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, and that he had spent most of his life reading the sacred scriptures."

IN Kingston on the Hudson is a low, long, stone house with a white cornice, on which is this inscription, "Senate of the state of New York, 1775." Upon a sign over one of the side doors is this: "Col. Wessel Ten Broek, born at West Philadelphia, 1635, erected this stone house about 1686, wherein the Senate of the state of New York was held in the year of the adoption of its first Constitution, 1777, continuing here until the burning of Kingston, Oct. 16, 1777."

MIRACLES, like spiritual manifestations in our day, prefer darkness rather than light. Wonderful visions and miracles come to the ignorant, as a rule, only, and it was only in the world's greatest intellectual night that they flourished. "The days of miracles are past," cry the orthodox. "Nay," says the earnest seeker after truth, "we need a good square miracle now if ever we did; not prayer to believe what our reason revolts against, but a square, fair, and no denying miracle."

THE meeting to discuss the affairs of the latest business assignment was held in the Y. M. C. A. building—just about the most appropriate place for a bankrupt meeting that could be imagined. The number of bankrupts that hav graduated from that benign institution since it was built makes it peculiarly select. There are hallowed memories about that building, young as it is. The first floor is occupied by the Bank of Montreal, the up-stairs for prayer-meetings, while there are more rumshops congregated in the immediate vicinity than anywhere else in the city.—Halifax Mayflower.

EX-SHEPHERD COWLEY, finding no alacrity on the part of the Christian public to respond to his appeals for money, has now taken to writing long and tiresome letters to the papers. He represents himself as a badly used person, and stoutly denies that he was cruel to the wretched victims of his miserly economy. The more letters Cowley writes the less money he will get, and the less brilliantly will he appear as a burning and a shining light in the ecclesiastical fold which whitewashed him instead of turning him out for a wolf.

THE Douglas monument and sarcophagus at Chicago, which cost about $75,000, is now receiving its finishing touches, a bronze tablet medallion being added which represents "legislation," and which will hav a place on one side of the base. The body of Douglas reposes within the sarcophagus in an iron casket. The marble of which the sarcophagus is made came from Rutland, Vermont, Mr. Douglas's nativ county. On its front sides are these inscriptions: "Stephen A. Douglas, born April 23, 1813; died June 3d, 1861." "Tell my children to obey the laws and uphold the Constitution."

THE Southwestern Baptist quotes from the letter of "a pious lady" to the editor the statement that "we hav a great many shakehead Baptists in our churches." The lady writes from Florida. This is an altogether novel variety of Baptists not known in this latitude. Why they should shake their heads is not explained. Possibly they may do so instead of shaking hands, as other people do. It must be a strange sight to see two of these good persons approaching each other on the street and gravely shaking their heads as if about to butt each other. The subject is shrouded in as deep mystery as that which enwraps the origin of evil.

PARAMUS, N. J., has an old stone church whose bell has called the people to worship for considerably more than a century. In its graveyard adjoining the church are some very ancient and very odd epitaphs. Here is one:

> You had better go home and dry your tears,
> For I shall stay here a thousand years.
> I, Rachel Doty,
> Died in 1830.
> 23 years I was a virgin,
> 12 months I was a wife,
> 11 days I was a mother,
> When I was called to Christ.

DR. LE PLOUGEON, a distinguished archæologist, writes the following interesting letter to the Evening Post from Merida, Yucatan: "I hav discovered the ruins of an ancient Masonic temple, where the priests and magicians used to gather in order to celebrate their mysteries. The Masonic lodge of those belonging to the first degree fronts toward the north; that of the Masons belonging to the second and third degrees points to the south. I hav found a few of the mystical dice, a stone on which is carved an apron with a hand on it, and a cabalistic stone. The stone is of such a description that I am of the opinion that I hav found a similar stone in the temple of Heliopolis. I hav taken copies in clay, and shall try to establish the relation between these discovered Masonic attributes and those found at Memphis and Thebes. I think I may not be mistaken if I suspect a relation as well with those attributes discovered by Gorringe on the pedestal of the Cleopatra obelisk at present in Central Park, New York."

WILLIAM CLIFFORD, Roman Catholic bishop of Clifton, England, has come forward with a new and original explanation of the first chapter of Genesis. The main fact which he makes clear is that he believes in it as little as Darwin or Tyndall. Scientifically, he declares that it can neither be explained nor defended. He does not look for science in the Bible. He rejects as an untenable hypothesis the idea that the days are periods of undetermined length. The order of creation set forth in the Mosaic record is not of the scientific order. Casting about for the real meaning of Moses, he points out that the real meaning of Moses was that the Egyptians set apart the days of the week for heathen festivals; and Moses had good reason to fear that his followers would recur to the Egyptian forms of worship. Moses, desiring to offer them a substitute for the heathen feasts, wrote a hymn for them, in which he did not profess in fact to giv a history of the days of creation, but only to consecrate to the one deity of all creation the days of the work, which still bore among the Israelites their heathen names.

IN the National Reformer of Aug. 14th Mr. Bradlaugh thus explains the illness he has suffered from the effects of his disagreement with the members and officers of the House of Commons: "When I endeavored to make a protest in favor of peace in 1878 I was severely injured by some of the Jingo roughs, then paid and organized by the Tories to put down by bludgeon and brute force all expression of opinion against the policy of Lord Beaconsfield. One of the results of the injuries I then suffered was a rather dangerous attack of erysipelas in the left arm. On Wednesday last the same arm again came to grief, and on Friday erysipelas marked the gentle methods resorted to by the House of Commons to prevent a duly elected member from representing his constituents. On Saturday this attack grew worse, and on my return from Northampton was sufficiently menacing to compel me to appeal to Mrs. Besant to take my place at the Hall of Science. Although I am perforce chained to the house by this unpleasant attack, it is not, I think, likely to hav any permanently serious consequences. Many friends hav written me with recipes and remedies, and many more still with kindest wishes for my recovery. I thank them all, and am glad to say that the attack seems abating."

THE S.-S. Times, which is undoubtedly Christian, laments thus over "withheld statistics:" "How it would startle some of our congregations to hav the pastor follow the reading of the annual report of his church with a few of the withheld statistics, somewhat after this sort: Of the thirty-two that hav joined our church the past year I find that five of those who came in on profession hav unmistakably fallen into former evil ways, while of those who were received by letters three were certainly lacking in good character in the churches they left, although by the record they were in 'good and regular standing.' One of our elders is popularly reported to hav swindled a neighbor outrageously in a notorious business transaction. We hav lost one of our most prominent members by his tranfer to the county jail on conviction of crime. A careful examination of our record has convinced me that fully one-third of our members can be counted on the 'dead-head' list. They do nothing in the line of Christian activity. As to their example, they are not bad enough to be a warning to the outside world, nor good enough to be taken as an example by anybody, in or out. Our benevolent contributions look pretty well for our number, but I learn that nearly one-third of their full amount has been given by four persons, and that of the other members of the church more than one-half gave less to religious causes than they pay toward amusements, while there are not a few families which gave more for peanuts during the year than they put in the contribution box. A fair estimate of the tobacco bill of the congregation i twice and three-eights the amount given by the church to home and foreign missions combined." Such a supplement as this, in kind and degree according to the particular community, could be truthfully made in many a church where the annual report last presented is spoken of as "in every way encouraging."

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XI.

When Madame Bertollon had returned from the villa her husband introduced me to her.

"Here," said he, "is Alamontada, a youth whom I love as my friend, and whom I wish nothing but that he may become yours also."

Fame had not spoken too much about her. She was very beautiful, scarcely twenty years old, and could serve artists as ideal for Madonnas. An agreeable timidity beautified her the more. The fewer of her sex and class in Montpellier even knew the refined modesty without which amiability loses all charms.

She spoke little, but well. She appeared cold, but the loveliness and brightness of her looks betrayed a feeling heart, an activ mind. She was a benefactress of all poor, and the whole town honored her. Neglected by her husband, worshiped by young, handsome men of the best families, could slander nevertheless discover no blemish in the purity of her morals. She lived an almost hermit-like life. I myself saw her rarely. Only in the last year of my study at the university a sickness of her husband caused us to meet often in his room.

The tender care about the health of her husband could be read in all her features. She was incessantly busy for him. She prepared for him the medicins, she read to him, and when the disease had reached its crisis she did not leave his bed; through continued night watches she destroyed her own health.

Mr. Bertollon after his recovery remained the same in his coldness and politeness toward her. Her kindness remained unanswered. She appeared to feel his indifference deeply, and gradually became more and more distant from him as his health returned. I could do nothing but pity her and reproach my friend.

"But what dost thou want, Colas?" cried he, "art thou master of thy heart, that thou darest to demand obedience of mine? If it pleaseth thee, well, I will agree with thee, my wife is beautiful; but empty beauty is only a pleasing shimmer, under which the heart remains cold. Why do we not fall in love with the masterpieces of sculptors? I own up to thee she is intellectual; that one usually does not love, but at the highest admire. She is very benevolent; but she has money enough, and takes no pleasure in costly entertainments. She has shown, during my sickness, much attention to me. I am grateful to her. Nothing shall be wanting to her that she wishes and I am able to giv. But the heart cannot be given—it must be won! Moreover, friend, thou knowest her too little. She also has her weaknesses, and, with thy permission, her faults. But now if unfortunately among these faults one or the other were of such a kind that it from necessity would extinguish in my breast every germ of affection, what then could I be blamed for, if I could not change stone into gold, and an alliance for convenience into a cause of the heart?"

"But never, dear Berlollon, never discovered I even the slightest trace of such a great fault."

"Because thou knowest not my wife. To thee, as my friend, I might as well reveal what in the very first days of our married life made me forever distant from her. It is her ungovernable, senseless, raging, her all-destroying, passion. Trust not the ice and snow of the outer appearance; a volcano boils below, which must from time to time send forth flames, if it shall not burst its encasement. She is quiet, and therefore the more dangerous. Each of her emotions takes a long time before it exhibits itself, but then it is unquenchable and all-destroying. She seems to be virtue personified, and the very soul of kindness; without her unfortunate disposition she might become a saint. But this destroys everything better. I hav caught her already in ideas so horrid, so frightful, that one cannot comprehend how one of them could steal into the soul of a woman, or how she could harbor it. And in this manner, friend, no heart can be gained."

These confidential revelations shook me the more, as I had myself already experienced Bertollon's knowledge of human character and his correct, penetrating eye. I meanwhile did not cease to continue the intercourse with Madame Bertollon in oftener repeated calls. I thought to notice that she found pleasure in conversing with me. But she was always the calm, patient, gentle one. So much beauty and so much mildness changed my reverence into hearty friendship. I made the resolution to, at any cost, unite her again with her husband, or rather to lead him back into her arms.

CHAPTER XII.

The habit of meeting daily gradually freed us from troublesome etiquet, and made the society of Madame Bertollon a necessity for me.

"You are Bertollon's first friend and confidant," said she once when she, leaning on my arm, promenaded up and down in the garden near the house. "I also consider you my friend, and your character givs me a right to your kindness. Speak frankly, Alamontada. You know it. Why does Bertollon hate me?"

"He does not hate you, Madame. He is full of the highest esteem for you. Hate? He must be a monster if he could do that. No, and he is a noble man. He can hate nobody."

"You are right. He can hate nobody, because he can love nobody. He does not belong to the whole world, and to nobody; the whole world and everybody belong only to him. Never, perhaps, has education poisoned a heart richer in feeling and a more talented head than his."

"You judge, perhaps, too harshly, Madame."

"Oh, would to heaven I did! I entreat you, convert me."

"I convert you? Not so, Madame. Watch your husband and you will change your mind."

"I watch? I always did that, and always he is the same."

"At least a good, amiable man."

"Amiable? He is that. He knows it, and takes pains to be so; yet it is a pity, not for others, but to make himself happy. On that account I cannot call him good, and yet he is not bad."

"Certainly, Madame. I do not understand you fully. But permit me to return your confidence with confidence. Never yet hav I known two persons who deserve so much to be happy and so fit to be so, one through the other, as you and your husband. And yet both stand separated! Certainly I believe to hav lived and done enough in this world if I could reunite you both with each other in the strongest love and bring your distant hearts together."

"You are very kind. But in spite of your work being already half done, for my heart has long followed his, which flees from mine, so, I fear, you desire an impossibility. But if one should be successful in this, you would be the one. You, Alamontada, are the first one to whom Bertollon surrenders himself so entirely—on whom he lays so solid a hold. Try it; change the man's mind."

"You joke. Change him. What virtue do you yet demand that Bertollon should exercise? He is generous, modest, the protector of innocence, always of the same temper, without conspicuous passion, publicly useful, friendly——"

"You are right. That all he is."

"And how shall I change him?"

"Make a better man of him."

"A better man!" replied I, astonished, and stopped and looked perplexedly into the eyes of the beautiful woman, which glistened with a tear. "Why, is he bad? Is he vicious?"

"That Bertollon is not," she answered; "but he is not good."

"And yet, Madame, you admit he possesses all the beautiful qualities which I before praised in him? Do you not, perhaps, ask too much of a mortal?"

"What you hav praised in him, Alamontada, hav I not denied. But these are not his qualities; they are only his tools. He does much good, but not because it is good, but because it is profitable to him. He is not virtuous, but prudent. He sees in all acts only the useful or the hurtful; never the good and the bad. He would just as soon use hell as heaven full of virtues to the accomplishment of his aims. He places happiness in reaching that which he desires, and for that he is and does what under the given circumstances may be expedient. The world to him is a play-ground of desires, wherein all belongs to the luckiest and most cunning one. The throng of people living together created, as he believes, states and laws, religion and practices. The wisest one, in his opinion, is he who knows even the finest thread of the entangled net of circumstances; and he who knows this is capable of all. Considered by itself, nothing is right, nothing wrong. Opinion alone sanctifies and damns. Behold, Alamontada, this is my husband. He cannot love me, for he loves only himself. His mind and taste change, and accordingly his manners. With iron zeal he follows up and reaches his aims. He is the son of a distinguished family, but which had sunk down from the hight of former wealth. He wanted to become rich, became a merchant, disappeared in distant regions, and came back as the master of a million. He wished to secure his wealth through an alliance with one of the most distinguished families of the city. I became his wife. He wished to hav influence in public affairs without awakening envy. He made himself popular, and declined the first places of honor. Nothing, by his manner of thinking, is beyond his reach. He knows no sanctity. He overpowers everything. Nobody is strong enough for him, because everyone is weak through some kind of an inclination, or passion, or opinion."

This picture of Bertollon's manner of thinking startled me. I found it in all features similar to the original. Never before had I in my own mind raised all that to a clear understanding, although it lay darkly hidden in my feelings.

I discovered the immense abyss which separated the hearts of this couple, and despaired to fill it up.

"But, Madame," said I, and pressed, moved, the hand of the beautiful unfortunate, "do not despair. Your untiring love, your virtue, will finally fasten him."

"Virtue? O dear Alamontada, what may one hope of this man, who calls virtue weakness, or one-sidedness of character, or prudery of the mind; who considers religion merely a business of church and education, wherewith the fancy of the bashful plays with child-like zeal?"

"But he has a heart, this man!"

"He has a heart, but he has it for himself only, and not for others. He wants to be loved, but without returning it. Ah, and can such a one be loved? No, Alamontada, love demands more. It surrenders itself entirely to the loved one, and livs in him, and is no longer mistress of itself. It cares not, it counts not, and it risks whether it will finally be blessed by truthfulness or strangled by treachery. But hopeless it will not be. It demands the heart of the other, and therein even lies its paradise."

The Questions of Zapata.—Concluded.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF VOLTAIRE BY AVERY MERIWETHER.

38. I pray you tell me by what means Samson took three hundred foxes, tied them together by the tails, to which he attached lighted torches, and then turned them loose in the grain-fields of the Philistines to set the grain on fire. Foxes do not inhabit a country unless it is covered with woods. There was no forest in that country; moreover, it seems to be a very difficult thing to take three hundred live foxes and tie them together by their tails. It is said that Samson killed a thousand Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, and that of one of the teeth of this jaw-bone he made a fountain. How did he use the jaw-bone of an ass for such purposes? Explain, if you please.

39. I ask for some explanation concerning the good Tobit, who slept with open eyes and was blinded by sparrows? Also concerning the angel who descended to the world for the express purpose of assisting the son of Tobit in looking for the money which the Jew Gabel owed him; also concerning the wife of the son of Tobit, who once had seven husbands whom the devil had twisted by the neck. Tell me how they restored the blind to sight with the gall of a fish. Such tales as the above are hardly more worthy of attention than just so many Spanish romances.

Shall I make allowances for the sacred text which says that the beautiful Judith was descended from Simeon, the son of Ruben, and in another passage says that Simeon is the brother of Ruben? Can the sacred text lie?

I admire Esther very much, but I find in this book that Ahasuerus, a false king, did not know that he had married a Jewess. He laid with his wife six months before he found out who she was. Much of the rest of this book is made of like improbabilities. Clear up these perplexities for me, O sage masters!

40. I need your advice about the history of the kings, and that of the judges, that of Tobit and of his dog, that of Esther, that of Judith, and that of Ruth, etc. When Saul was declared king the Jews were slaves to the Philistines. They did not permit the Jews to hav swords or lances, yet at the same time they compelled them to sharpen their instruments. Saul at one time gave battle to the Philistines and won the victory. In this battle he was at the head of 330,000 soldiers. This was in a steril country, which could not to-day support twenty thousand inhabitants. Perhaps the surplus numbers in Saul's army were obliged to make a living by becoming courtiers at Damascus, Tyre, and Babylon.

41. I am unable to justify Samuel when he cut to pieces the king of Agag, a prisoner of Saul, and who was even promised the privilege of a ransom. I do not think our good king (Philip IV. of Spain) would be admired were he to conclude to chop his prisoners in pieces.

42. Why should we hav such a great respect for David, who was a man after God's own heart?

I fear to test by ordinary laws the conduct of David, who associated with four hundred wicked men. David plundered the house of Nabal, servant of the king, and eight days afterward married the widow. He offered his services to Achish, the enemy of his king, and desolated by fire and blood the land of the allies of Achish, without sparing sex or age. As soon as David was on the throne he took new concubines. Not content with this additional number of concubines, he ravished Bathsheba and killed the dishonored husband. I hav still some hesitation in thinking that Christ was born in Judea of an adulterous woman and that he was descended from the homicides found among the patriarchs. Such misgivings as these giv me extreme trouble.

43. The riches of David and Solomon, which amount to more than five thousand thousand millions of ducats, present difficulties incompatible with the poverty of the country. Our colonels of cavalry would shrug their shoulders if I should tell them that Solomon had four hundred thousand horses in a small country, where there were no other than asses, as I hav already had the honor to represent to you.

44. If it is necessary for me to run over the history of the frightful cruelties of nearly all the kings of Judea and Israel, I fear to scandalize those fables more than to improve them. Those kings assassinated each other too often. It was a bad kingdom, if I am not deceived.

45. I find that small body of people, the Jews, nearly always slaves either under the Phœnicians, or under the Babylonians, or under the Persians, or under the Syrians, or under the Romans, and I hav some trouble in reconciling so much misery with the magnificent promises of their prophets.

46. I know that all oriental nations hav had prophets, but I do not know how to interpret the prophecies of the Jews. What shall I understand by the vision of Ezekiel, son of Buzi, near the river Chebar. What is meant by the four animals who had each four faces, four wings, and the feet of calves. How shall I explain the command of God to Ezekiel to eat a book of parchment; to bind himself; to remain lying upon the left side for three hundred and ninety days, and upon the right for forty days; and to eat his bread in the manner described? I cannot penetrate the hidden meaning of that which Ezekiel says in chapter sixteen: "I hav covered your nudity, I hav given you robes, hoods, girdles, ornaments, and ear-rings, but at last you are only a misshapen prostitute, and you hav prostituted yourself in public places," and in chapter twenty-three the prophet says that "Aholibah desired the bed of those whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses." Sage masters, tell me if you are worthy of the favors of Aholibah.

47. It will be necessary to explain to me the words of the great prophet Isaiah, who foretells the coming of our master, Jesus Christ. This prophecy is in chapter seven. Bezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, besieged Jerusalem. Ahaz, king of Judah, consults the prophet Isaiah upon the event of the siege. Isaiah answers him: "God will giv you a sign; a girl or woman will conceive and bear an infant who will call himself Immanuel. He will eat butter and honey before he is of an age to discern evil and good. Before he will be old enough to reject the bad and choose the good, the country will be forsaken of two kings . . . and the master shall hiss for the fly at the extremity of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria, and in that day the master will shave with a hired razor from those on that side of the river and shave the head and the hair of the feet and all the beard of the king of Assyria."

Finally, in chapter eight, the prophet, in order to accomplish his prophecy, lies with the prophetess. She bears a son and the master says to Isaiah, "You will call that son Maher-shalah-hash-bag, hasten-you-to-take-the-spoils, or, run-quickly-to-the-booty; and before the infant knows how to call his father and his mother the power of Damascus will be overturned."

48. In what light shall I understand the history of Jonah on his way to Nineveh to preach repentance? As Nineveh did not belong to Israel at that time Jonah at least should hav instructed the people of Nineveh in the laws of the Jews before inducing them to repent. The prophet, instead of obeying his God, journeyed to Tarshish; a tempest arose, the sailors threw Jonah into the sea in order to calm the storm; God caused a large fish to swallow Jonah; he remained three days and three nights in the belly of the fish. God then commanded the fish to throw up Jonah and the fish obeyed. Jonah landed upon the coast of Joppa.

God then ordered him to tell the people of Nineveh that if they did not repent in forty days their city should be overthrown. From Joppa to Nineveh it is over four hundred miles. Does not such history demand a superior knowledge and faith than I possess? I wish to be able to confound the savans who pretend that story is taken from the fable of the mythological Hercules. Hercules was shut up three days in the stomach of a whale, but he was more contented, for he dined upon the liver of the whale. Jonah was not so adroit.

49. Teach me how to explain the first verses of the prophet Osée. God ordered him expressly to take a prostitute and hav sons by her. The prophet obeyed promptly. He addressed Dona Gomer, the daughter of Don Debelaim. He took three years to make three children of one type. Finally God wished another type. He ordered him to lie with another one of the villagers who happened to be married, and who already had planted horns on the forehead of her husband. The jovial Osée, always obedient, has no trouble in finding a pretty lady of that character, and it did not cost him more than five drachmas and a measure of barley. I pray you to make me acquainted with the value of a drachma at that time among the Jews, and what you should giv in the present time to such women if the Lord ordered it.

5. I hav still more need of your instructions upon the New Testament. I do not know what to say when it is necessary to reconcile the two genealogies of Jesus. Why do they tell me that Matthew makes Jacob the father of Joseph, and Luke makes him the son of Heli, and as that is impossible, as we could not change He into Ja, or li into cob? Some hav asked me how it is that one counts fifty-six generations, and the other cannot count more than forty-two? and why these generations are entirely different? and still why, in the forty-two generations which are promised us, it is possible to find only forty-one? and finally why it is we hav a genealogical tree of Joseph, who was not the father of Jesus? I hav no more been able to explain this folly than my predecessors. I hope you will lead me from this lybyrinth. Are you of Saint Ambroise's opinion, who said that an angel impregnated Mary through her ears? "Maria per aurem imprægnota est." Or are you of the opinion of R. P. Sanchez, who said that the virgin had regular connection with the sacred spirit? The question is a curious one. The wise Sanchez believes that the sacred spirit and the holy virgin emitted at the same moment, for he thought that a meeting of the two seeds were necessary for complete generation. We see that Sanchez knows more of theology than of physics and that the profession of making infants is not understood by Jesuits.

51. If I announce, according to Luke, that Augustus had ordered an enumeration of the whole earth, when Mary was enciente and Cyrenius or Quirinus, governor of Syria, published the enumeration, and that Joseph together with Mary went to Bethlehem to take the census, the people will laugh at me. And it adds to my perplexity when antiquarians tell me that no enumeration of the population of the Roman empire was ever taken; that Quintilius Varus and not Cyrenius was at the above-mentioned time governor of Syria; that Cyrenius did not govern Syria for no less than ten years after the birth of Jesus. I hav no doubt but that you will clear up this little matter for me, for if there is falsehood in the sacred book must that falsehood also be considered sacred?

52. When I point out that the holy family went into Egypt, according to Matthew, I am told that this is not true, because they rested in Judea, according to the other evangelists; and when I then assent that they remained in Judea, some maintain that they were in Egypt. I am not hypercritical when I say that they could not hav been in two places at the same time, as is maintained by St. Francis Xavier and other saints.

53. Astronomers can very well ridicule the stars which conducted the three kings into a stable. But you are great astrologers, my masters, you are able to giv a reason for that phenomena! Tell me about how much gold the kings offered; for you are conversant with such matters. As regards Herod, the fourth king, why should he hav feared that Jesus, born in a stable, would become king of the Jews? Herod was only king by the authority of the Romans, so it was an affair of Augustus, the Roman king. The massacre of the innocents is a little startling. I am vexed that no Roman historian has spoken of those things. An ancient martyrologist who was very veracious (as all those under us are) enumerated forty thousand children who were martyred. If you wish me to add a couple of thousand to this number you hav but to say so.

54. Please tell me how the devil carried God and placed him upon a hill in Galilee, where all the kingdons of the earth could be seen. The devil promised all these kingdoms to God provided God would fall down and worship him. Hav you not one word of praise for this liberality of the devil?

55. I pray you when you go to a marriage to tell me how God, who also attended marriages, was able to change water into wine, for a set of people who were already drunk.

56. When eating figs for your dinner in the latter part of July, I pray you think to tell me why God being hungry searched for figs in the beginning of of May, when that was not the time for figs.

57. After having received your instructions upon all these wonders, and upon that one especially, it is necessary to ask why God was condemned to be hung for the original sin. But I am told that there is no such thing as original sin mentioned in the Old or New Testament. It is only mentioned that Adam was condemned to die the day he partook of the tree of science, but he did not die. It is said that Augustine, bishop of Hippone, previously a Manichean was the first one who started the doctrin of original sin. Now certain disputatious people hav attempted to prove that it was impossible for God to hav been condemned to death because a certain species of apple was eaten some four thousand years before his death upon the cross. I am unable to answer such insinuations and am forced to hide my head with shame. People tell me that it is impossible to redeem the human race, and that Christ has not redeemed it yet. If he has, why are so many people yet in the hands of the devil?

58. Throw some light upon the prediction made by our Lord in St. Luke, in chapter twenty-one. Jesus there expressly says that he will "Come in the clouds with great power and majesty, before the generation to which he then spoke had passed away." He did not do this and he has not yet come in clouds. If he has come in clouds we know nothing of it; tell me if you know anything of it. Paul said also to his disciples of Thessalonica that they should go in clouds with him before Jesus. Why hav they not made that trip? Does it cost more to go to the clouds than to the third heaven? I ask pardon, but I love the clouds of Aristophanes better than those of Paul.

59. Shall I preach according to Luke, who says that Jesus went to heaven from the little hill of Bethany, or shall I agree with Matthew, that it was from Galilee where the disciples saw him for the last time? Shall I believe a wise doctor who said that Jesus had one foot in Galilee, and the other in Bethany? This opinion seems to me to be the most reasonable one, but I will abide by your opinion.

60. I hav been asked if Peter had ever been in Rome, and I answered that he without doubt had been pope twenty-five years. The main reason I gave was that the church has a letter of that good man, who neither knew how to write nor read, and that letter is dated from Babylon. No one could reply to this argument, but I wish something more forcible, if you are able to giv me such.

61. Tell me why the creed which we call the symbol of the apostles was not made before the time of Jerome, four hundred years after the apostles. Tell me why the first fathers of the church do not cite the evangelists which are now called apocryphal. Is not that evident proof that the four canonical books were not true?

62. Are you as offended as I am because the first Christians forged so many bad verses which they attributed to the sibyl; bcause they forged the letters of St. Paul to Seneca, the letters of Jesus, and the letters of Mary and the letters of Pilate; and because they established their sect by one hundred crimes which ought to hav been punished by the courts on earth? These frauds are to-day recognized by all the savants. We are forced to call them pious frauds, but is it not sad that your wisdom does not prevail rather than such dreams?

63. Tell me why Jesus did not establish seven sacraments for our church? Why did Jesus never declare that there was a trinity; that he had a double nature with a double will, and one body. We define trinity to mean one person with two natures. What need had Jesus for two wills, when he had no power to teach the dogmas of Christian religion? And why has Monsieur, the archbishop of Toledo, a million ducats in rents when Christ said that among his disciples there was neither a first nor last place. This seems to be a reductio ad absurdum.

64. I know well that the church is infallible, but is it the Greek church, or Swedish, or the English, or the Danish, or the Latin, or the church of that proud city of Neuchatel, or the primitiv church of the Quakers, or the Anabaptists, or the Moravians? The Turkish church has some good principles, but I am told that the Chinese church is still more ancient.

65. Is the pope infallible when he lies with his mistress or with his own daughter, and when he carries to supper a bottle of poisoned wine for the Cardinal Adriandi Corneto?* When two councils anathematize each other, as has been done twenty times, which is the infallible council?

66. Would it not be far better to preach the doctrin of simple virtue rather than to entangle ourselvs in theological labyrinths? On the great judgment day I seriously doubt if God will ask us whether grace is versatil or concurrent; whether marriage is a visible or invisible sign; whether we believe that he (God) has ten choirs of angels or nine; whether the pope is superior to the counsel, or the council is superior to the pope?

Will it be a crime in the eyes of God to address prayers to him in Spanish when we do not understand Latin? Will we be objects of God's eternal anger if we eat certain dishes on certain days of the year? Will we be punished if we hav eaten a small dish of turbots, or soles, or sturgeons during Lent? In the bottom of your hearts, O sage masters, you do not think God will judge us according to the ideas of St. Thomas or St. Bonaventure, or will he rather judge us according to our works?

Shall I not believe the moral law as laid down in the works of many authors? Some of their principles are so pure, so saint-like, so universal, so clear, so ancient, that they seem to hav come from God himself.

Has not God given to man self-love for self-preservation; benevolence, kindness, and virtue, to keep guard over self-love. These are double necessities for evolving society. He gave us pleasure in order to enjoy existence, and grief in order to moderate our pleasure. He gave us passions in order to spur us to grand deeds, and wisdom which bridles our passions. Has he not inspired all men who are gathered together in society, with the idea of a supreme being? Has he not made adoration of a supreme being a strong binding-link of society? The savages who wander in the woods hav no need of that idea. They hav no regard for the duties of a society, the principles of which they are ignorant of, but they hav reason, and reason was given to them by God.

God does not make people adore him for a vain purpose. He regards prayers as more necessary to man than to him. At the same time God gave man the spirit of religion, without which society would dissolve. He gave them the genius for art, and the principles of science.

Will you, O sage masters, permit me to announce these simple truths to my congregation and to the Spanish nobles?

67. If you wish to conceal these truths; if you absolutely order me to preach upon the miracles of St. James in Gallatia, and of our Mother of Atocha, and of Mary of Agrida, who in her ecstasies showed her naked sides to a rabble of small boys, I shall obey, but what shall I do with the refractory ones who doubt all these things? Must I report them, and hav them put in prison and tortured?

When I come across the daughters of the Jews can I lie with them before condemning them to be burnt?

I await the honor of your answer.

DOMINICO ZAPATA,
Y verdadero, y honrado, y caritativo.

NOTE.—Zapata, not having received an answer, betook himself to preaching Deism. He taught that the father of man was the rewarder, punisher, and the pardoner of all people. Zapata made a distinction between truth and myth, between religion and fanaticism; he illustrated and practiced virtue. He was sweet, kind, and modest, and was roasted at Valladolid in the year of grace 1631. God hav mercy on the soul of brother Zapata!

ON THE ATLANTIC, MIDWAY BETWEEN NEW YORK AND GLASGOW, Tues., Aug. 4, 1881.

DEAR READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It was right along here somewhere that I directed my first letter to you last year, while on my first passage to Europe, and perhaps I can find no more proper place from whence to begin my letters to you on my tour around the world. I have been taking a survey of our surroundings in this latitude and longitude, and it looks to me just about the same place as where I commenced my letters to you a year ago. The water looks just about as blue; it seems just about as disturbed; it looks just about as far to the edge of the jumping-off place or the horizon, and the clouds look much the same color. I have not taken soundings as to the distance to the earth through the waters, but from the observations I have taken I should not know but it is just about the place, though very likely it may be twenty-five miles further north, as we are now steering for Glasgow, and then we were making for Liverpool. Last year we passed along by the southern end of Ireland, but this year it will be the northern end.

We have now been out five-and-a-half days from New York, and the captain says we have made just about half the distance between the two ports. This is very convincing that we are not going to make a quick trip. Last year, the Gallia, of the Cunard line, on which I took passage, made the transit in nine days, but this steamer, the Ethiopia, of the Anchor line, will be some eleven days. Then we sometimes made as many as 360 miles in twenty-four hours, but the greatest distance yet made on this passage is 270 miles in the same length of time. The Gallia is evidently a faster steamer than the Ethiopia, for the weather has been quite as favorable during this passage as it was last year, and the sea has been smoother, though for the most part the winds we have had have been head winds.

What we lose in speed perhaps we gain in steadiness. The Ethiopia seems to be quite a steady steamer. So far she has not rolled and pitched nearly so badly as the Gallia did on both our outward and inward passage. There are, perhaps, three reasons for this; first, the weather has been better this time; second, this steamer has a much heavier freight, which steadies her greatly, and thirdly, the shape of the hull of the Ethiopia is more favorable against rolling, which is a strong commendation in her favor.

Now, as for the time being I have become an Ethiopian, and that too without changing the color of my skin, it is but fitting that I should tell you a little about the steamer, a little about the line she belongs to, and a little about the passengers we have on board. The Ethiopia is eight years old; she has been running on this line that length of time, and has been considered a fortunate vessel. On her second trip she broke her main shaft, and she is the first ocean steamer that ever mended her main shaft at sea; but by drilling and the application of good mechanical skill the repair was effected, though it required some fifteen days to accomplish it. A steamer was sent out from Glasgow to tow her in, but by the time the Ethiopia was reached the repairs were made, and she was able to run away from the steamer which came out to tow her home. One of the mates informs me that he has been serving on her for three years, and that during that time no accident has befallen her and not a man has been lost from her by falling overboard or otherwise. The captain's name is Campbell, a regular Scotch name. All the officers and crew are Scotchmen and have the "Sandy" characteristics clearly marked.

The Ethiopia is over four hundred feet in length, forty-two feet in width, has a tonnage of over four thousand tons, and her engines are of five hundred horse-power. She has a portion of her freight-room occupied by one of Coleman's patent refrigerators, in which, by means of pumping and condensing air, the temperature is kept down to thirty-three degrees—one degree above the freezing point. Every trip she makes to Glasgow she carries 3,400 quarters of beef, and 500 carcasses of sheep. The refrigerator is the invention of Prof. Coleman, of Glasgow, and the Coleman Refrigerating Company now rent room in each steamer in the Anchor line, as well as other lines, and ship the beef on their own account, by which business they are realizing enormous profits. On some of the steamers they occupy more space than on the Ethiopia, and carry 6,000 quarters of beef at a time. In its incipiency the invention was looked upon with much distrust. The inventor endeavored to sell his patent to the company, but they declined to invest in it. He and his associates then rented space in the steamers, and filled it themselves. Many were the predictions that the plan would prove a failure; but half the first lot of beef that was shipped to Glasgow by this plan was readily sold, and the other half was taken back to New York and sold in Washington Market for fresh beef, though it had been away from the city over five weeks. This was done to prove the utility of the invention. The steamer company then, seeing that the invention was a grand one, proposed to Prof. Coleman and his partners that they would purchase the right. "Oh, no," said Coleman & Co., "we will keep it in our own hands and derive the benefit of the invention ourselves." A ninety-horse-power engine is used on this steamer to condense the air, and the Coleman Company send two engineers along to attend to it and to look after their interests. This plan saves a great deal of expense and space for the transportation of ice for keeping the meat cool. It used to require three hundred tons of ice each trip to keep the same amount of meat cool, which is now effected better by this condensed-air process. Thus the world moves.

The Anchor Line must be a wealthy company. It has five steamers running between New York and Glasgow, six between New York and London, three between New York and Barrow, England, where the newer steamers have been built; and besides it has a bi-weekly line running from Liverpool to Bombay, in India. It had a hard struggle for several years, and made little or no money; but now it is doing a good business and paying a net dividend to the stockholders of fifteen per cent per annum, with a liberal allowance for wear and tear and the depreciation of values. The stock is largely held in Scotland, a considerable share in England, and a very respectable portion in the United States. It is a company of limited liability.

I will say a little about the passengers. Some forty of them are in the first cabin, twenty-five or thirty in the second cabin, with about the same number, or more, in the steerage, making less than a hundred all together. This is not more than half the number that was on the Gallia, and they are not so distinguished, wealthy, and aristocratic a class. A goodly portion are Scotchmen returning from a visit to America, or who have been living many years in the United States, and, after making a good sum of money, are now going back to the mother country on a visit. Some are English, who are returning home temporarily, while several are Americans going abroad for pleasure, and others in the pursuit of health. Among the latter class are Captain James Belger, of the New York Postal Department; Mr. Harmon, a young merchant of Paterson, N. J., and Mrs. Oliver, of Chicago. Capt. Belger and Mrs. Oliver are afflicted with rheumatism, and go abroad for relief. A Mr. Tablor and wife, a Scotch couple, of Portland, Oregon, have been thirty-five years in America, and, having accumulated a competence, are now going back to Scotland to see the old hills once more, and as many of those they once knew as are still living. Mr. Donaldson, a sawmaker, of Rock Island, Illinois, another Scotchman, has also made some money, and is going over home to recuperate for a few months and to accompany his wife home, who is now in Scotland. Mr. Ramsay, a lawyer of Cincinnati, with his daughter and another young female friend from Steubenville, are going abroad for a few months' recreation over Europe, to return in the fall. A New York cotton broker, who resides in Brooklyn, and his wife are also with us, as well as a good many others whose names and history I have not learned. We have several musicians on board, and the piano in the cabin has to suffer accordingly. Some of the steerage passengers have a violin and a guitar, which they bring out about sundown and hold a musical concert on deck, while others join in waltzes, etc. Quoits and cards are played by a portion of the passengers, but not nearly to such an extent as on board the Gallia.

My sympathies have been somewhat awakened for a Mr. T. of Illinois, who had a brief but unpleasant experience with some New York sharpers. In company with a friend he stopped at the Astor House, and on the day before sailing was standing near the door of that building, while his friend was being shaved by the barber. While thus waiting, one of those conscienceless villains approached him in the blandest manner, and holding out his hand, said:

"Why, Mr. Morris, how do you do? and how are all the folks at Harrisburg?"

Mr. T. replied, "My name is not Morris, and I do not live in Harrisburg. My name is T., and I live in R., Illinois."

"Ah, my dear sir, excuse me. I thought you were Mr. Morris, of Harrisburg, Pa. Have I not seen you there?"

"No, you could not have seen me there, for I have never been in Harrisburg."

"Pardon me then; I must be mistaken. You look very much like my old friend Mr. Morris. Good day."

The villain having thus learned Mr. T.'s name and residence, withdrew, and undoubtedly imparted the information to an accomplice. Very soon another very friendly individual presented himself, and grasping Mr. T. by the hand, said:

"Why, Mr. T., how do you do? I am very glad to see you here. When did you leave R.?"

Mr. T. looked at him and said: "I do not know you, sir. I do not think I ever saw you before."

"Oh, yes, you have, many a time, but you may have forgotten me. Of course you know Mitchell, the banker in your town. Well, I was a clerk in his bank for two years, and I often used to see you when you came to town."

Mr. T. is a pretty extensive farmer near R., and not knowing all the clerks that had lived in R. within the last ten years, concluded he might have seen this young man, and subsequently have forgotten him. The sharper, seizing this partial concession, briskly pressed his acquaintance.

"Yes, I remember you very well, Mr. T. I have seen you many a time, and am glad to meet you so far from where I used to see you. But I am not now following the same business I used to. I have given up banking, and am now selling the best grades of woolen goods. For many years we had to send to England for all our best broadcloths and cassimeres, but with the advance made in machinery and the mode of manufacturing we have got so now that we can surpass the English in the production of the best woolens in the world. I have my samples close by here, Mr. T. If you will just step with me a moment I will take pleasure in showing them to you."

"Oh, no," replied Mr. T., "it is hardly worth while. I am not dealing in anything of the kind. It will be of no use to me to look at the samples. Besides, I am waiting for a friend who is in the barber shop, and I do not wish to leave till he comes."

"It is only a few steps, and will take you but a minute or two. Come on, I think you will be interested."

Thus importuned, Mr. T. went with his whilom friend to a "sample room" hard by, where the samples were in the line of goods called gin, rum, and whisky, and here, sure enough, the fellow had a roll of samples of broadcloths, cassimeres, etc., which he soon had opened and commenced describing with eagerness. While this was taking place a third person entered the sample room in an apparent state of great excitement, and gave vent to language like this:

"Look here! Can I get anything to eat here? I want to get out of this d—d town in about fifteen minutes. I have been used the worst kind here."

The dealer in woolens at once became much interested in the new-comer, and asked him what had befallen him.

"Oh, damn it! I have just been swindled out of four hundred dollars. I came to this city with a lot of horses from Kentucky, which I sold at good prices, but I'll be d—d if I wasn't just now swindled out of four hundred dollars in less than ten minutes, and a little the neatest of anything you ever saw."

"Why, tell me how it was done. I would like to know about it. Explain."

"It was done with a pack of cards. A fellow dealt them out most skilfully, and I thought I saw in which pile he put a certain card, and bet my four hundred dollars like a man, and lost it before you could say Jack Robinson. But I bought the cards, and here they are, and I'm going to see if I can't get some of my four hundred dollars back again."

The dealer in woolens professed to feel great interest in the matter of the cards, and requested the Kentucky horse trader to show him how they were manipulated. The seller of horses was very willing to accomodate the man of woolens, and immediately dealt the cards into three piles. One of the cards, called, perhaps, the "little joker," was shown, and then dextrously deposited on one of the piles, but the trick of the thing was to tell which the pile was, and this is the point on which the betting was done. The man of woolens was very sure that he saw unmistakably which pile the little joker was in, and he eagerly bet twenty dollars that he could point it out. The horse dealer humored him, and took the bet. The man of woolens indicated the pile, but was mistaken, and of course lost. This only made him more anxious to try it again. The Kentuckian was kind enough to deal the cards again, and this time showed the cloth-merchant almost positively where the little joker was deposited. The cloth-merchant turned to Mr. T., saying:

"I see into this thing now. I hav just got the hang of it. I am sure I can win now every time, if I only had the money to bet with. I have lost all the money I had with me, but if you will lend me a hundred dollars or two for a few minutes I will make a good haul and we will divide the gains."

Mr. T. is evidently a very good-natured man, and possibly was willing to increase his pile of gold somewhat, and he handed over to the whilom bank-clerk, whose acquaintance he had so fortunately renewed, the sum of two hundred dollars, in English gold, which he had received for national bank bills the day before. The thing was decided in half a minute, and of course the cloth-merchant lost, and of course the two hundred dollars of Mr. T. was hopelessly gone. Alas! for human expectations.

At this juncture the keeper of the sample room approached the trio in a very excited manner, saying: "Look here, none of this, you are gambling and there is a heavy law against it—$500 fine and six months' imprisonment. Get right out of this or we will all be sent to prison. Get out at once."

Of course there was nothing for the woolen merchant, the Kentucky horse trader, and our honest farmer friend, Mr. T., of Illinois, to do but vacate the sample-room at once. The Kentuckian walked off his own way, doubtless congratulating himself that he had so soon recovered $220 of his lost $400, while the woolen merchant and Mr. T. felt correspondingly dejected. The man of woolens said, "It is too bad to lose such a sum of money; you go with me and I will pay the $200 back to you again." Of course Mr. T. wanted his money and the pair walked away together. They had, however, gone but a short distance before it flashed upon Mr. T's mind that the keeper of the sample room was an accomplice, and the impulse seized him to go back and give that sample-room man a small piece of his mind. The obliging woolen merchant favored the project and said he would await his return. Accordingly Mr. T. went back and had the pleasure of telling the mixer of cocktails that he thought him a dishonest man; upon which he received the assurance that his opinion was very wrongly founded. When, however, he returned to rejoin his friend of the woolens, he was not there. Probably some urgent business had called him away.

Mr. T. had no recourse but to rejoin his friend who had visited the barber, and to recount the unfavorable result of his little speculation, regretting, of course, that the $200 which he had made by tilling the soil had flown forever. He even wished he had not met Mr. Mitchell's old bank clerk, who had adopted the woolen trade. I talk with him occasionally, and I fancy I trace a trifle of sadness in his countenance for those sovereigns which are forever lost to him and his heirs. He has no hesitation in acknowledging himself a great fool to do as he did, and he is half way of the opinion that it served him right. He is, however, a sort of philosophical Scotchman, and it is to be hoped that visiting the friends of his boyhood in his rugged native land will drive away the memory of the lost two hundred. There is some consolation in the assurance that he is not a poor man and that he has enough left to make his journey comfortably.

I am glad to be able to report to you that I have thus far had no sea-sickness. The tossing and rolling of the steamer has not been sufficient to disturb the equanimity of my reliable old stomach. But I am sorry to say some of the passengers have suffered not a little. My traveling companion, poor Mr. Bridges, has had a pretty serious time of it and has been compelled to keep his berth a good deal. He has put in an appearance at the table but a few times. His stomach refused to be composed and has several times revolted at the steamer's motion. Probably the getting rid of considerable bile will be a benefit to him, and he will be all the better for it when we are again on terra firma.

There has not very much occurred to relieve the monotony of the voyage. We saw a pretty large school of porpoises rolling and tumbling along, and a few had the good fortune to spy a whale in the distance and see him spout. I was not one of the fortunate number. Sea gulls are occasionally seen even thus far out at sea, but they are not nearly so large as those near the coast of Ireland. We have not spied many sails, some days seeing none at all, while on one day three were in sight at once. We are just now passing the banks of Newfoundland and are favored with good weather. It is very common for fogs to prevail over the banks, but we are having no fog. We had some before we reached this point, necessitating the frequent blowing of the steam whistle, but not enough to cause inconvenience.

Last Sunday morning we had "divine service" in the music room, and the first-cabin passengers gathered in to partake of the bread of life. I was reading in the room previous to the meeting hour, and of course did not deem it necessary to leave the locality. The services were conducted by the Rev. John Stoddard, of the Scotch Presbyterian church, who has for five years been out on the island of Jamaica to hold forth to dwellers on that beautiful little island, and who, with his wife and two children, are now returning on a vacation of six months to his native Scotia, and especially for the benefit of his wife's health, who has been considerably afflicted in Jamaica with fevers, erysipelas, etc. Both are fleshy and look robust, but the climate of the island agrees much better with him than her. She speaks very highly of Jamaica, its climate, and society, and says she must go back, for she cannot think of leaving their lovely congregation there. She has a profuse quantity of shells of many sizes and styles which she and her friends picked up on the beach of the island. They are indeed beautiful.

But to return to the Sunday service. Two or three of the hymns from Sankey's collection were read and feebly sung, a part of a chapter was read from the epistle to the Ephesians, a prayer was offered up, when the Reverend Mr. Stoddard stood up for Jesus; but, in my opinion, the effort was a feeble one, and I could not see that the cause of the lowly one was much advanced by the efforts the Scotchman made. He eats at the same table I do, nearly opposite my place, and I am constrained to say that he handles his knife and fork far more dexterously than he did his arguments in his sermon. He evidently takes more interest in eating than speaking, and it is quite likely that it is to keep him at the former which impels him to pursue the latter. He is a big, burly, two-fisted fellow, and looks better adapted to growing oats and hoeing potatoes than occupying the pulpit.

Ocean travel is rather monotonous. There is little or nothing along the way to make variety and enliven the drooping spirits. The same heavy rolling waves, the same deep blue water, the same lowering clouds, the same misty or foggy horizon, is about all one has to see; but, as I said to Bridges to-day, it is a good deal better than being cast away on a plank, or driving hogs in the deep mud. After two or three days of ocean life, however, the novelty is gone, and one wishes for the land he is steering for. It seems almost like a waste of time to be so much upon the water, with so little that is new, so little that presents variety to the senses. But as we undoubtedly have some twenty thousand miles of ocean travel to perform, it will not do to tire of it so soon. One inevitably becomes impressed, at all events, with the muchness of the watery element encircling the earth, and he almost wonders where it all came from, and whence the salt came to make brine of it all. But nature is a prolific provider, and she is not stingy with her supplies. She furnished oxygen and hydrogen in abundance to form all the water on the earth, with a big surplus left over for numerous other combinations. Great is nature; great are her resources. There is nothing and can be nothing to equal her.

I have been spending a portion of my time since leaving New York at writing up a series of articles begun in THE TRUTH SEEKER some three years ago —"What I Don't Believe." When I was sent to prison these articles were necessarily discontinued; and I have had so many other things to take up my attention since that they have not been resumed. I have intended to take them in hand for the last three months, as I have frequent calls for the volume to contain the same, but having at all times a good deal else to occupy my attention rather deferred the duty till now. On this passage over I have more leisure than I have had before in a long time, and have been using it in telling you what I don't believe. As there is so much that I cannot easily believe, it requires a good while to tell all, and it will probably use up much of my leisure time till I reach Glasgow to tell you all about it. The same will probably be laid before you in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

My mind oft reverts back to the farewells which my numerous friends so kindly tendered me. The parting at the steamer's side is vividly clear in my memory. I can still see the numerous white handkerchiefs waving in the air from the end of the pier as the steamer receded from the wharf. I can realize the hearty "good-bye" and "God-bless-you" thus fraternally extended. I can realize, too, the same feelings welling up in thousands of hearts in all the states and territories of our broad land, and am fully conscious that I am kindly remembered as I am wending my way toward the rising sun, and I am sure I have your kindest wishes and richest blessings. Never did a man start out on a long journey under more favorable auspices—never did a more wide-spread and kindly feeling go out toward one starting on a tour around the globe. I shall endeavor to keep intact the wire that connects us. I shall hope that we may not become estranged, but that in spirit and in memory you will accompany me all the way around, and that the fraternal feeling which for years has existed between us may become stronger than ever upon my return from my wide wanderings o'er land and sea, to close a somewhat eventful life quietly at home.

It is just a year to-day since I sailed from New York last year, when I left for Liverpool. As we will probably be some two days longer in making the passage this time than that, I will reach Europe at very nearly the same date. The weather here is from twenty to thirty degrees cooler than at New York. Overcoats are quite comfortable. The change has been too great for comfort. It is hard to realize, while we are shivering around on deck, that friends at home are sweltering and roasting with the heat. There is probably very little really warm weather on the ocean in these latitudes. It is a delightful place to cool off.

I have got slightly acquainted with a Scotch physician who has spent several years in China, and have learned from him several points relative to the celestial land. He is now returning to Scotland with his family to make it his home again. He seems to have done very well in the flowery kingdom.

Sunday evening, Aug. 7th.—We are getting along very well, but not making remarkably fast running. Two hundred and ninety-three miles is the longest day's run we have made yet, which is fully fifty miles less than the distance made some days last year on the Gallia. This steamer is stanch and large, but her engines are of two hundred less horse-power than those of the Gallia. We are heavily laden with corn, cheese, and beef, and we have had head-winds much of the time, but the principal difficulty is said to be that the vessel is "foul." She has not been in dock since she has been in service. Could she go in dock, have her engines repaired and the barnacles (small shell-fish) scraped from her bottom, she would make at least a knot more per hour.

I learn we have had both a birth and a death on board to-day, and in the same person—a very small child born of English parents who went out to Tennessee to join a colony, but not liking it there are on their way back to England. They have a rather unhappy time of it. The little stranger was born too soon and departed too early. He will probably be food for the fishes, so far as he goes. He will hardly be a mouthful for some of those porpoises I have seen tumbling along.

I am sorry to say we had no divine service to-day, by which I was a trifle disappointed, as I had fixed myself up in an unusually pious mood, ready for the bread of life as soon as it was broken. With two clergymen on board, one a Presbyterian and the other an Episcopalian, it is a wonder why religious services should be dispensed with on a Scotch Presbyterian steamer. Mr. Stoddard duly presented himself in the music room and seemed disposed to preach and pray, but the connection was not made. Compensation was made this evening, however, by holding a sacred concert in the music room. Two young ladies alternately manipulated the organ, and the way we sung "The Sweet By and By," "Meet Me at the River," "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and about half a dozen other pious hymns of the same class ought to be very satisfactory to the angels in attendance.

In connection with this religious subject I am sorry to be compelled to state that I have learned unpleasant news about Sister Stoddard, the wife of the Presbyterian clergyman from Jamaica, and that is that she drinks intoxicating liquors to excess. It is reported in the first circles of the steamer that she absolutely drank a bottle of whiskey and a bottle of brandy in a single day. It is also reported that the way she "cut up" and "raised old Ned" in her room was a caution to Bacchanalians. She has mixed in with the élite of the steamer but very little for the last day or two, and then it was remarked that from the rolling of the ship or some other cause she walked quite unsteadily. I can now account for the florid cast of her countenance, and am led to fear that the erysipelas of which she complained might possibly be imbibed in a fluid form. She expressed to me great regret at leaving her dear congregation in Jamaica, but if she has been in the habit of conducting herself there as she has on this ship I fear the regret is all on her side. I am indeed sorry for her husband and her two pretty little girls, and am truly regretful that her religion is insufficient to restrain her appetite for drink.

A lady passenger from Chicago has a very interesting parrot which amuses us not a little, as its cage occupies a central position in the dining saloon. It is a great talker. She opens conversation with many of the passengers, and when a reply is made to her

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

SUNDRY NAMELESS WOMEN HEALED AND COMFORTED BY JESUS.

Now Peter had a mother-in-law, and she got sick, as mothers-in-law sometimes will, and however much Peter might hav desired to rid himself of her the evangelists report not, but they do record that she was healed. (Matthew viii, 14, 15; Mark i, 30, 31; Luke iv, 38, 39.) Matthew says she was laid and sick of a fever, and that Jesus only touched her hand and the fever left her, and she arose and ministered unto them. Mark tells the same story, except instead of Jesus seeing her of himself, he says, "Anon they tell him of her, and he came and took her by the hand and lifted her up," etc. Luke says she had a great fever, and that they besought him for her (as if he did not readily and willingly attend to her case) and he stood over her and rebuked the fever, etc.; nothing said about touching her hand or lifting her up, but that he rebuked the fever, as if it had been a rational, intelligent being. All agree that she had a fever, that Jesus healed her instanter, and that she arose immediately and "prepared the Sabbath meal," as Brown declares the ministering unto them to mean, "in token both of the immediateness of the cure and of her gratitude to the glorious healer."

Is it not surprising in view of this, and when Jesus promised, "Greater things than I do ye shall do," that those who profess to believe in him should not employ ministers at their bedsides when ill instead of medical men, and insist upon being healed in the good old way? It seems not to hav been thought of in the emergency at the White House, though the promise stands firm and sure forever according to the divine word.

Luke relates another miracle in these words: "And behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. And when Jesus saw her, he called her to him, and said unto her, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity. And he laid his hands on her; and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God. And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the Sabbath day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work; in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath day. The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?" (Luke xiii, 11–16).

The Sabbath, it will be remembered, was Saturday, and as Jesus very justly called them hypocrites so might the reformers of to-day call the sticklers for Sunday observance the same, for no more do we Liberals violate their first day of the week than did he their seventh-day sacredness. If he is or was authority, he destroyed the Sabbath effectually, as he abolished it by working on that day, believing and teaching that the day was made for man, and he ordained no other in its stead. Henry C. Wright used to state it: "The hat for the head, not the head for the hat. Would you knock out your brains to save your old hat? Institutions for men, not men for institutions." Another defines it thus: "A full-grown man curled up in a cradle thus answered his interrogator as to the cause of his location, 'My mother put me here.'" The moral is, as mankind outgrow institutions the latter should perish, not the people remain squeezed into their small-clothes and stultified. The hypocrites of this age ought to be ashamed under similar rebukes, whether Jesus's Sabbath-day violations ever occurred or not.

Brown says that this "spirit of infirmity on the woman, 'whom Satan hath bound,' was probably the effect of some milder form of possession," that is, it was not a physical disease, but a possession of evil spirits that bowed her together eighteen years; so it was not much of a cure to boast of after all. We should judge the bystanders thought so, as they seemed not in the least surprised at the healing, but only found fault because it was done on the Sabbath day. But to proceed.

Our next miracle, for we treat of none but those performed on women or connected with women, will be found in Matt. xv, 21–28; Mark vii, 24–30; the former of which is here quoted:

"Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. And behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshiped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

Mark calls this woman "a Greek, a Syrophœnician by nation," which gives Smith some trouble in his dictionary to reconcile with Matthew that she was of Canaan; while Brown glides over the discrepancy with, "So called as inhabiting the Phœnician tract of Syria." The divines take great comfort in feeling, "though a gentile, and no Israelite herself, she salutes him as Israel's promised messiah." Mark says further, "Jesus entered into a house and would have no man know it; but he could not be hid." Jesus appears to hav been fleeing from the rage of the Pharisees, and in no mood to minister to heathen, but this woman fell at his feet, worshiped him, and so cried after him in her persistency, that though at first he deigned not to answer her, and, when he did, declared that he was only sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and not until she implored him more and more, "Lord, help me," did he give her to understand that the Israelite children were not going to be starved at the expense of stuffing Canaanite dogs! What a response, "Yea, Lord, yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." Thus beaten and put to the blush, as we should infer, he took the devil out of her daughter.

There are two points to be considered in this story in addition to those already hinted at. First, is it strange that Christians should consider themselves superior to all other people and sects, and that they are the peculiar favorites of their Almighty Father, when Jesus taught practically the right of exclusiveness, and the disciples and his immediate successors enjoined, "Come out from among them and touch not the unclean thing, and be ye separate from them?"

Second, Jesus compares all but Israel to dogs! Is it surprising that when he thus set an example his followers anciently should have called the Saracens, Arabs, Mohammedans, and all unbelievers, "Infidel dogs," and that through the ages all kinds or opprobrious epithets should have been heaped upon dissenters, and that to-day the Lord's Zion should designate those outside of the ark of safety as "wild-mouthed, blasphemous Infidels," "gutterish drunkards;" their writings "Deistical trash," and their movements "devilish." See Rev. G. H. Humphrey in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Feb. 1 and 8, 1879, on Ingersoll and Paine; and Truth, July 19, 1881, where a correspondent is accused by another correspondent of "gross stupidity," "blasphemous insinuations and abject and filthy degradation of utterance," "utter barrenness of common sense," "surcharge of bosh and twaddle," "guilty of consummate 'ignorant ignorance;'" called a "stupid lout," "Bob. Ingersoll's (boss Infidel)," for the correspondent to whom all these vile epithets are applied is no less a man than Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and all this slander and much more in a Christian article of forty-five lines.

Well, what better can be expected of a sect following a leader who commanded, "Learn of me," and then indulged in such high-toned, gentle, amiable terms as "dogs," "hypocrites," "child of hell," "blind guides," "ye fools and blind," "ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" "Ye are of your father, the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning; . . he was a liar, and the father of it;" and who swore and cursed a helpless fig-tree until it withered under his blasphemous maledictions! Query.—Did this tree possess sensation and intelligence, and did it shrink and wither as would a loving, sensitive child under the curse of a stern, tyrannical father?

This same Jesus in a parable (Luke xviii) represents God as an unjust judge, to whom an importunate widow comes to be avenged of her adversary, and though this judge feared not God, nor regarded man, yet because she troubled and wearied him by her continual coming, he avenged her, not for her sake nor justice's sake, but for his own ease and convenience. Then this great moral teacher, Jesus, makes the application by inquiring, "Shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? I tell you that he will avenge them speedily." That is, keep praying, begging, or teasing, as did this woman, and this unjust God, the same as this unjust judge, though he has no regard for justice, mercy, or love, rather than be wearied by your continual coming in prayer, will finally avenge you, or grant your petition—that is, if you are "his own elect." What a God! Keep on praying, ye elect ones, and tire your God all out; then he will get out of patience and answer you for your importunity! Was this Jesus's idea when he would not answer the woman who cried after him for her daughter until she had fallen at his feet, worshiped him, and besought him repeatedly, "Lord, help me," and why he would not go near Lazarus for two days when sent for? Was he imitating this trait of his father God to make the people cry after him all the more? The same pernicious doctrin is taught in Luke xi, 5–13 in regard to prayer, viz., "I say unto you, though he will not rise and giv him, because he is his friend, he will rise and giv him as many as he needeth." Then Jesus urges them to "ask," "knock," and "seek," promising them if they will do so it shall be given them, etc.

We come now to a most important event or events, for it is a double transaction, recorded in Matt. ix, 18–26, Mark v, 24–43, Luke viii, 41–56, and giv it in the words of Matthew:

"While he spake these things unto them, behold, there came a certain ruler, and worshiped him, saying, My daughter is even now dead: but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall liv. And Jesus arose, and followed him, and so did his disciples. And behold, a woman which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment. For she said within herself, If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole. But Jesus turned him about, and when he saw her, he said, Daughter, be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole. And the woman was made whole from that hour. And when Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the minstrels and the people making a noise, he said unto them, Give place, for the maid is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. But when the people were put forth, he went in, and took her by the hand, and the maid arose."

Mark and Luke vary this account, and both add thereto, giving the name of the ruler, Jairus, and stating that when he first came to Jesus his only daughter, twelve years of age, "lay a-dying," that the ruler said, "lieth at the point of death," not, "even now dead," as Matthew has it; that Jesus started to go with him, the throng followed, and that it was then while on their way that this nameless woman who "had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, came in the press behind, and touched his garment. And Jesus immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about and said, Who touched my clothes? and the woman, fearing and trembling, came and fell down before him and told him all the truth" (Mark). Luke adds they all denied touching him, but admits, with Mark, the rebuke to Jesus by his disciples, getting in the name of Peter in the connection. Mark and Luke declare that it was at this moment, while Jesus was yet speaking, "thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace," that there came one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him (the ruler), "Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further?" and Jesus answered, "Fear not: believe only, and she shall be made whole." Mark says that he suffered no man to follow him to the house save Peter, James, and John, while the other two declare that he put out all them who were inside holding a wake over the supposed corpse. All three agree in stating that Jesus said, "The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth," before he took the father and mother, Peter, James, and John, and entered in where she was lying, restored her, charged them that no man should know it, and commanded that something should be given her to eat. Luke specifies—meat.

There is not the least probability that the girl was dead, but in a state of coma from some cause, that Jesus perceived it, and therefore told them not to weep, etc. There were but five present besides himself, according to the account, when she was restored; and no Spiritualist of to-day would think of palming off such a phenomenon upon the Christians as genuin evidence of their having raised one from the dead. Even should they attempt it, the whole Christian world, Catholic included, though they profess to work miracles sometimes, would "laugh them to scorn," and cry out, "Humbug! you cannot catch us with your tom-foolery!" And yet we must be damned if we will not or cannot believe their story.

Our next and last healing or raising from the dead by Jesus is, very fortunately, only recorded in Luke vii, 11–18, thus rendering unnecessary all vain attempts of reconciliation with the other evangelists. It would have been well had the compilers of the New Testament thrown to the dogs all but one of the gospels, then there could have been no comparisons, "odious" in themselves, and odious in the eyes of Christians, would-be believers, and skeptics. But to the narrative:

"And it came to pass the day after, that he went into a city called Nain: and many of his disciples went with him, and much people. Now, when he came high to the gate of the city, behold there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow: and much people of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. And he that was dead sat up and began to speak: and he delivered him to his mother."

How did it happen that Jesus had compassion on no other widowed mother, and on the relatives of but two other deceased persons, viz., Lazarus's sisters and Jarius, if he possessed the miraculous power of raising the dead?

We have not space or time to indulge in comments on this story, the preceding ones, nor yet the healing of the diseased persons and the raising of the supposed dead through the means said to have been here used. To those who believe that Jesus was God and that with God all things are possible, no explanation is required, for could not this same God who said, "Let there be light and there was light," and who in six days created this great universe out of nothing, open the eyes and ears of the blind and deaf, loosen the tongues of the dumb, dry up the issues of blood, restore withered hands, straighten crooked backs, cleanse lepers, heal lunatics, cure instantaneously impotency of thirty-eight years standing, cast out devils by the legion, and bring to life dead men and maidens if he choose, even when "in a state of decomposition," as Brown affirms he did in the case of Lazarus?

Why should not great things be expected of one who had four fathers to sire him! We know of some humans who are excellent mind-readers and healers, who were born in the ordinary way, having but one father, and why should not this quaternion-fathered god be their superior in that line? Some may inquire as to the authority for this assertion. Bible authority of course, and the reverend commentators and divines by the hundreds to confirm it! Did not Mary, his mother, declare Joseph to be his father, and the genealogy, also? Did not Jesus himself say God was his father? Was he not begotten of the Holy Ghost? (he who begets a child is a father, is he not? any proxy in that affair?) and was he not his own father, being God? and if Gabriel, who made the announcement to Mary, had a finger in the pie, why, then he had five fathers!

Is not that scripture and divine revelation?

Fanatical women who are so beside themselves when they think a dumb devil is cast out as to lift up their voices in the multitude and cry out, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee and the paps which thou hast sucked" (Luke xi, 27), would not be considered competent legal witnesses to-day in a similar reported miraculous case of healing or raising from the dead, even by Christians in a Christian court, but probably would be sent to a mad-house, unless Comstocked at once for street obscenity by those very Christians who indorse the same as a part of God's word when applied to their Jesus.

Similar cases now reported are called psychology, or of the devil, or disputed by Christians, except when inside of their church, then they are attributed to the direct power of God in answer to prayer.

Spiritualists claim that this power is derived from and regulated by spirits, while Materialists and skeptics believe that the facts—if facts there are—will be accounted for on some unknown law of mental, physical, and electrical absorption, either self-induced or otherwise, without any aid from God, a Jesus, angels in heaven, or spirits, except earthly ones, dependent on earthly causes.

All that is true involved in clairvoyance, human magnetism, healing, and kindred phenomena, will, in the onward march of science, be demonstrated, traced to remote and obscure causes, classified, utilized, and assigned to its proper place in mental and physical philosophy, so that the ages to come will not stumble in supernatural darkness under this spiritual eclipse of intellect and reason, as has all Christendom and humanity in the past, and are still doing in these beliefs which have been criticised and condemned.

Christianity is responsible for the assumptions of modern Spiritualism, the latter being an outgrowth of the former revamped, for God, Jesus, angels, and prophets, substituting spirits, departed friends, mediums, and materializers.

We come now to another widow, for whom Jesus did nothing, for it was she who did for him or for the then church. See Mark xii, 41–44, Luke xxxi, 1–4. We quote from Mark: "And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury; and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily, I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury. For all they did cast in of their abundance, but she, of her want, did cast in all that she had, even all her living."

And they accepted it, did they? Shame on them! All her living, and Jesus called his disciples to see it, and commended her for casting in her penny, all the living she had (Luke), instead of advising her to reserve it for her own use. Brown says "she might have kept one of these mites," but Jesus desired "to teach from it a great future lesson. They cast in of their superfluity what they had to spare, but she cast in of her deficiency her whole subsistence. As temple offerings are needed still for the service of Christ at home and abroad, so looking down now as then up, he sees who casts in and how much."

Shameful! What an inducement for poor widows and indigent women to give their last mite as "the offerings of God," and all for the support of a lazy, useless priesthood! Is this the lesson that Brown says Jesus wanted to teach for the future? If so, it has been well learned and most faithfully taught, as many of us can testify at our cost and loss. Did we not see it practically illustrated in 1863 at the Methodist centenary in Elkhorn, Wisconsin, the shire town of Walworth county? There were assembled some half dozen clergymen, who meandered the country in squads, soliciting centennial offerings from the people. They preached, exhorted, prayed, and held out every conceivable inducement to the audience and citizens to pledge large sums for the Lord's use, to be collected in installments if not convenient or not able to pay all at once. One of these servants of the ever-living God told a story to touch their hearts and move their hands into their pockets of a poor, crippled octogenarian widow who had been all the year with her old, paralyzed, trembling hands knitting socks to sell, so that she could contribute her mite toward the Lord's offering, and that when they arrived at the town where she lived (somewhere in the vicinity—the name was given), and they heard the fact, they had her brought into the meeting in her chair, and placed in the broad aisle, that all might see her; that they might make an example of her for others. Then he piled up the agony, taking her case for a text, as did Jesus of the widow and the two mites, inquiring of the rich and the poor if they could not do as much for the Lord as this poor old widow, who was a dependent and supported by charity. I wanted to speak right out in meeting and ask him and the ministerial clique in the desk if they were not ashamed of themselves to accept such offerings and then publicly boast of their disgrace; if it was not their duty to have given her of their abundance instead of taking her mite, for they gathered, in all, over $1,000,000. But no, in our ears still rings their "Go thou and do likewise."

Women, this is the despair of Christianity. When you will no longer thus be fooled by these men of God, who are the leeches of society and the drain upon your purses, the bane of all morality, the end of free thought, religious drones and the pests of all reform and progress, the canker of civilization, and who would be the controllers of your homes, families, affections, and rob you of all independence, substituting their infernal creeds for science, philosophy, industry, and pleasure in order to make you sigh through this world in hopes of psalm-singing in another of which you nor they know nothing.

Elmina at Church.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Elmina has been to the holy temple of the divine oracle to-day, and listened to the wisest and most eloquent of all the dispensers of truth and light that Snowville has ever been favored with. And this great expounder of the faith according to Alexander Campbell gave us a beautiful discourse on the existence of God, the glory of his works, and the gloom of Atheism, with its incongruous gods of chance and fatality.

"And you came home convinced and converted?" ask you. Nay, not by a long shot! Only more firmly and securely grounded on the sure certainty that matter is all there is, and that mind is only a form of force—an attribute of living, activ, organized matter, and not, as he told us, a something that was before matter, and gave to matter its life, force, power, and potency. He talked of dead men and dead matter as if the two were similar, while we know that man is an identity, and all identities must die, and that matter is only substance or material out of which identities evolve or are made, and is not only full of all forms of life, but is life itself, and dead or inert matter is a dead and gone idea of the ages of ignorance.

This wise leader of the only Christian church set up a great number of men of straw, and gracefully popped them over, one after another, with beautiful flashes of rhetoric, accompanied by appropriate gestures; convincing his too willing dupes of the foundationless condition of all forms of Atheistic philosophy. It was like an Arcadian dream of romance, or a beautiful fairy tale of our childhood—pleasant to hear, nice to while away an idle hour with; but when tested in the crucible of reason, science, and and philosophy all vanished like mists before the sun. "Suppose now," said he, "I carefully search one corner of one room, in one house, for a book, and find none there, and on the strength of this hunt I declare that there is not a book in all the room, or in all the house, or in all the dwellings round about, or in all the state of Virginia. Well, this is what the Atheist does. He searches in his little corner of the world for a God, and finds none, and then declares that in all the vast systems of planets and suns circling through the spaces of the great universe there is no God?" Now, how many in the eager, listening audience of all that congregation of preacher-worshipers do you suppose could see the sophistry that was so neatly embodied in this one little incident of the sermon? This comparing of a well-known, real, and tangible object, like a book, a thing so common as to be seen in almost any corner of any room, in any house, to an imaginary, inconceivable, and impossible nothing, that has never been seen in any corner of any room, in any house, or in any other place in all the universe, why, it is the most absurd and ridiculous of comparisons.

We hav all seen, felt, and read books, and can even make books ourselvs, but when we try to look at a god we gaze on vacancy, when we try to touch a god we grasp empty air, when we attempt to read him we find legends, fables, and myths, when we try to make him we create only dreams, fancies, and vain imaginings.

He attempted to prove from a single rain-drop the power of a great architect, who drew that drop, little by little, from the ocean and carried it on the sunbeams till it expanded into a cloud and floated into a colder region and was once more condensed and let down gently into the lips of a thirsty flower, or perhaps into his own mouth as he had opened it to catch it, when he was a boy. God always let it fall by wise and careful laws, and not come pelting down in torrents, dealing death and destruction, as "chance would do it," but he never whispered about deluges, cyclones, water-spouts, and whirlpools.

Oh, no; these would show a loose screw in God's great water-works, so they are carefully kept in the background, because it might look as if chance did things instead of a wise and benevolent God, who sent each drop gently on its mission of good to man.

He used science, law, and God's power to describe the wonderful and beautiful adaptation of the atmosphere to the needs and demands of our race. He told how very heavy the air was, and yet how well balanced it was by the universality of its presence inside and outside of us, so that we could more freely inhale it and only realize pleasure in its nice fitness for its uses. He told how a little more oxygen or a little less nitrogen or carbon, or other changes, would hav made it destructiv to all life, but never breathed a syllable as to the hundreds of lives that are yearly lost by the malaria floating on its breezes, the terrible wrecks made by its sweeping whirlwinds, that lay waste and devastate whole towns and villages, and miles and miles of forests. It is a "nice, soft, warm blanket," but it is also a keen-biting blast and a sharp, marrow-freezing, blood-chilling demon to the thinly-clad, poverty-stricken child who shivers along the winter-frozen streets of our cities.

He told us that all who planted in the hope of reaping, and all who slept in the hope of waking, believed in a God, because they trusted in his power to fulfil his own laws, but he failed to tell us that the Atheist's hope, trust, and confidence in nature's laws is only a natural sequence of his experience of all the past. He has planted and reaped, therefore he feels he shall continue to do so unless some unforeseen circumstance intervenes to hinder, and this we all risk just as we risk life every time we eat by not knowing that our food may not be poisoned or may not choke us to death as we attempt to swallow it. Like causes produce like effects, and from planted acorns we hav always found oaks to grow, and never once heard of one that germinated and grew an ox or a horse, or even a pumpkin. Nor hav we, as a general thing, known the sleep of the night to extend into weeks or months instead of ending with the rosy dawning of the coming day. It is true, there are cases of trance-sleep, and some who sleep and never wake, but these are exceptions, and we risk them, expecting to miss them just as the Campbellite expects to miss hades and condemnation himself, while he thinks the Atheist will find them.

He talked of chance as the god of those who denied his one boss deity, but never told his hearers that there could be no chance without miracles, and a miracle was good because it was done without reference to law.

When a Christian will show us one Atheist who believes in miracles or chance, and explains to us wherein it is possible to so believe, he will hav then made just one point that will count against Atheism as a scientific and rational system, and may score one for his side. Till then we will go on planting our truths, which in time will grow so large as to outroot his errors and run the ground for itself. We hav had a long and up-hill work of it, but it is a triumph well worth our labor to win in so glorious a cause as the cause of science against superstition, and realities against myths.

"As o'er his furrowed fields, which lie
Beneath a coldly-drooping sky,
Yet chill with winter's melted snow,
The husbandman goes forth to sow,

Thus, Freedom, on the bitter blast
The ventures of thy seed we cast,
And trust to warmer sun and rain
To swell the germs and fill the grain."

I can say that thrift, well understood, includes in itself the best virtues that a man can hav in the world; it teaches him self-denial, to postpone the present to the future, to calculate his means, and to regulate his actions accordingly.—Carlyle.

she says, "There is no doubt of it," in a very charming manner. She of course has to talk a good deal about "Polly" and in calling for "Annie." She is also a great laugher, and to hear her laugh and not see her you would think that about a couple of young girls were being tickled to within an inch of their lives. This morning when we had all become busily engaged in dispatching our chops, biscuit, and coffee, and everybody seemed wholly interested in what they were doing, Polly commenced laughing, and the way she kept it up, laughing and squealing, was most affecting. The laughing was very infectious, and everybody at the tables dropped knife and fork and joined Polly at laughing. It was the jolliest breakfast I have partaken of for many days. When one of the laughers said, "Polly, you are very good-natured," the bird replied, "There is no doubt about it."

Let me mention an interesting little girl, perhaps five years of age, which this steamer is bearing to Glasgow. It is said that when she was about to leave America she made a special business of bidding everybody and everything good-bye. She said, "Good-bye, uncle;" "Good-bye, auntie;" "Good-bye, cousin Jane;" "Good-bye, Herbert;" "Good-bye, Susan;" "Good-bye, Carlo;" "Good-bye, Kitty;" "Good-bye, dolly;" "Good-bye, playthings;" "Good-bye, God, I am going to Scotland."

Tuesday evening, August 9th.—It is now nearly ten o'clock; our passage is drawing to an end. We are nearing Glasgow, and I must draw my letter to a close so as to be ready to mail it in the morning, for I doubt not several of you will be anxious to hear from me and learn that we have had a safe passage. Barring that it has been ten and a half days since we left the dock at New York, we have had a very fine trip. Yesterday was pretty rough; a strong north-west wind made the waves roll grandly. The white caps were most abundant in every direction, and as far as we could see the ocean looked like a vast bowl of soap suds undergoing the most vehement agitation. It was by no means a gale, but the wind was brisk and the waves were very susceptible to it. The waves of the ocean are not so regular and rhythmic as I once used to think them. They do not roll along in straight rows like the furrows in a plowed field, nor like swaths in a mown meadow, but are broken, irregular, tossing, swelling, spraying, and foaming, with but little regularity, as though an earthquake or some submarine commotion had violently stirred up the deep waters to the very bottom. Neither are the waves so large or high as I used to suppose. I used to read of "billows mountain high," but do not find them out here. Of course they are large, and roll along in a grand and majestic manner, but they are not so large as mountains. A very small mountain, or a hill even twenty-five feet high, would be large enough to measure the waves by which I have seen. I think I have seen waves quite as large on Lake Erie as I found out here in the Atlantic. The regularity with which waves dash against the shore gives one the idea of a measured rhythm not found out here in mid-ocean. But I do not wish to say a word derogatory of the old Atlantic; it is an extremely large body of water, far the largest I have ever seen, and it has behaved itself finely on this passage, and I can only speak in its praise. It has leaped up on deck a few times, but perhaps it was mere sociability on its part; but it stayed but a short time and retired in good order. I must say I have the highest respect for it. It is the biggest thing of its kind anywhere in this part of the world. It really looked grand yesterday morning in the bright sun and brisk wind, with its tens of thousands of waves cresting, foaming, surging, and dashing in every direction. Yes, it was one of the prettiest sights I ever set my eyes upon, and I decided by a unanimous vote that old Atlantic is entitled to the first prize. I have a decided degree of veneration for it. I do not exactly worship it, but it belongs to dame nature's family of big children, and I reverence the entire family, perhaps as some Yahoos, South Sea Islanders, and Christians do their big gods. But my god is tangible, visible, ever present, active, moving, and anything else but stupid. I would not exchange my god for all the other thousands of gods that men have make and devised. Yes, nature, thou art indeed great, and I adore thee!

We have had a lovely day, this last day of our passage. The wind has been northeast, but not such a northeast wind as we sometimes have in America—not a northeast wind that brings a storm. It has been beautiful. The hills of Ireland, much to our joy, hove in sight on our right early in the forenoon, and we all made our obesiance to the old hills of Erin. As grand as the ocean is, one gets enough of it after ten or eleven days. Land, with its solid, unwaving, and untossing hills, presents a most welcome sight. I will not object to an ocean life for those who prefer it, but for myself and for steady wear give me the land. The ocean is very fine in its way, but there is an unstability of character about it that I do not fully appreciate. But the old hills are permanent, they can be relied upon every time. Yes, the hills of the Emerald Isle made us all glad, and we wondered how the mariners could strike it so accurately. It is indeed a marvel that when for days and weeks out of sight of land, the navigator can tell within a mile or two where he is. The northern coast of Ireland hardly strikes the view so pleasantly as the southern coast. Its hills look more sterile and rocky, with fewer farms and green fields, but probably back a little from the rock-bound coast it is all right. We have passed several islands a few miles from the main-land. We passed inside of Tory island, a mile or two in length, merely an elevation of rocks with a thin layer of soil upon it. I saw green fields of grass and turnips, but not a tree in sight. Turf is the fuel used, and we could see where they had recently been taking it up for their winter's fire-wood. I would prefer hickory, or anthracite coal. We afterwards passed a much larger island, owned entirely by a rich rector, who is also a magistrate. He is monarch of his little realm—a king in miniature. It is said he is very severe upon those from the main-land who are caught depredating upon his possessions. These islands are doubtless desirable property to their owners, but it occurred to me I would not take them as a gift and be obliged to live upon them. I would prefer two hundred acres of land in Illinois or Iowa, where I could be in more direct communication with the world.

We passed the town of Mabill (I don't know as that is the way it is spelt), on the main-land, situated on Loch Foile, a beautiful wide river—probably a mere arm of the sea. Twenty miles or more up the stream to the south lies Londonderry, a town of some forty thousand. The steamers of this line usually call at Mabill, where Londonderry passengers get off or on as the case may be; but we did not call, so nobody got off. Had the call been made Mr. Bridges and myself, with a few others, would have got off and done up Ireland first of all, but under the circumstances we concluded to go on to old Scotia. We soon came to the Giant's Causeway, about which everybody has heard or read. It stretches along the coast a mile or more, and as the steamer ran close we had a good view, and a number of glasses were brought into requisition. The Causeway consists of a range of perpendicular basalt rocks, 160 feet in hight, with curiously scolloped and figured surfaces facing the ocean, presenting the appearance of having been elaborately carved and groined, but it was done by the hand of nature alone. There are several recesses and uneven surfaces to be seen, and a cavern or two. In these the giant of the legend dwelt. At the mouth of one of the caverns Jack the Giant-killer is said to have dispatched him. This legend is probably just as true as many which are repeated oftener. On the smooth top of the Causeway next to the ocean is where the giant was wont to take his daily walks in pleasant weather, and as the sod is green and smooth it must have been a pleasant walk, but it would not have answered for the old giant to have tipped his bottle so much as to get topheavy and tumble off on to the rocks below. The upright rocks from the ocean look like the huge walls of a vast fortification with its curved and carved walls. The rocks in this locality are of the igneous class, and probably a few millions of years ago were thrown up by some internal force or commotion. The same formation is found in several localities hereabouts, and is also on the island of Staffa, two hundred miles north, where Fingal's Cave, a large natural cathedral, is located. Many tourists visit that locality to view the fine natural curiosity. As fine as the Causeway looks from the ocean, I must, however, confess to a slight disappointment; it is not quite what my fancy had painted it. Perhaps when visited from the land side, seeing it closer and taking the time to penetrate into the intricacies, its beauty may be more easily appreciated, but I had imagined that the Giant's Causeway was rather more than it seemed to-day.

Soon after leaving the last headland of Ireland—called the Giant's Organ, because of its apparent sculptured columns, like the large pipes of an organ, the land of Scotland is reached, an island first and then a promontory which extends more than forty miles into the sea, and extends northward a hundred miles or more. This part of Scotland belongs to the Duke of Argyle, one of the petty kings of Scotland. He owns hundreds of square miles of land, for which thousands of toilers have to pay him an annual rent. The fields are green with oats, barley, turnips, and grass, but hardly a tree is to be seen. We saw a country residence for summer use, where the noble duke after the twelfth of August goes with his friends to shoot grouse—a fine sport, doubtless. It is said that a rental of two hundred pounds a year is paid for small portions of the hill ground by lords and nobles from various parts of England and Scotland to come and shoot grouse. Is not that fitting business for the noble lords? It is said that many come here during the hunting season, even from London. The law prescribes that grouse-shooting shall not commence before August 12th, so it seems we shall have to wait a day or two before we can engage in that lordly sport, and then we will be under the necessity of renting a place at high figures to shoot from. Probably we shall forego the pleasure, and run the chances of getting our grouse at the hotels or restaurants.

We steamed close to the princely summer residence, by the water's edge, built by a Mr. Fleming, formerly one of the directors of the bank of Scotland, the disastrous failure of which occurred a few years ago. He was a large debtor to the bank, and owing to some irregularities of his he found it advisable, when the officers of the law were after him, to betake himself to Spain, where he now remains for safety's sake. His summer residence cost £40,000, or $200,000, a nice little sum for a summer residence for three months. Since he has gone to foreign parts his house is deserted, and would not to-day sell for ten cents on the dollar of its cost. It is a huge folly, but as it was built with other people's money perhaps it does not make much difference—that is the way of the world.

We passed, just at sunset, Elsa Craig, a lone rock a few hundred feet in diameter, which projects some two hundred feet from the sea. It is roundish, and looks like a huge dome. Millions of sea-gulls make it their rendezvous, and some of the natives make a good sum of money by shooting the gulls for their feathers and down, said to be fully equal to those of geese.

There! if you can tell where Moses was when he blew the candle out, you may know where I am at this moment—in the dark. The steward says it is time to close up and the lights must be put out, so I will retire to my berth for the last time. We have yet two or three hours' steaming to Greenock, at the mouth of the Clyde.

Wednesday morning, Aug. 10th.—Here we are lying at anchor in the middle of the Clyde, opposite Greenock. I was up some time before the sun, taking a survey of the beautiful country on both sides. The smoke is curling from scores of farmhouses on the hillsides back from the river. Everything looks green and beautiful. It rains so often that the fields are obliged to be green. It is said to always rain here, unless it snows, which it sometimes does by way of variety. The sun is just now peeping over the eastern hills and a fine rainbow is cast in the west; yes, it is raining this very moment, but it is only a passing scud. The sky is blue between the clouds.

The Clyde is wide here, and is well supplied with shipping and steamers lying at anchor in the stream. Here is a war steamer, off half a mile lies the Servia, the new steamer of the Cunard line, of 8,500 tons burthen, perhaps the largest steamer that plows the Atlantic. She will probably be a favorite. On the south bank of the Clyde, or rather on a point of land between the Clyde and Loch Long, an arm of the sea, is one of the Duke of Argyle's residences. It is a fine-looking establishment, with a beautiful green lawn in front running down to the river. Of course a noble lord like him would have nothing but a fine establishment.

We are to have an early breakfast this morning. Soon the custom-house officers will be aboard and look over our baggage—"luggage" here—and then probably we will be put ashore by a lighter, and then take the train for Glasgow, twenty-two miles up the Clyde. All is now bustle and hurry. The luggage is being got out and everybody is in a hurry to get on land once more. I am happy to say to you that I have been quite well during the passage and not sea-sick at all. I think I am getting to be quite a sailor. Mr. Bridges has been better the last few days, and I trust will be all right now. One poor fellow, Mr. White, from Providence, has been sick all the way over and has not taken a single meal. Here comes the custom-house officer. I have no whisky or tobacco so he passes my satchel readily. Now breakfast is over and I am writing this closing word, sitting on a trunk on the tender. Good-bye, Ethiopia, I must say you have done very well for us these past eleven days.

Hurrah for Glasgow by rail, and all over Scotland in four days! Good friends, good-bye. D. M. B.

Another Voyager Gets there Safe.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I arrived at Glasgow by the steamer Anchoria on the 3d inst., and am to-day doing this magnificent city, Scotland's capital, before leaving for England. The wind is blowing a gale here to-day, and I am thinking of Mr. Bennett upon the Atlantic; think he may get tossed about some; we did. If Mr. Bennett sailed in the Ethiopia he should arrive at Glasgow on the 10th inst. Bradlaugh is making it hot here now for the bigots. The papers are lively about him. Good luck to you and The Truth Seeker.

Most truly, T. S. Andrews.

Edinburgh, Scotland, Aug. 5, 1881.

The Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference will hold a three days' meeting in Spiritual Hall, Omro, September 9th, 10th, and 11th. James Ray Applebee, of Chicago, T. O. Willey, of Madison, and other speakers are expected to be present. Efforts are being made to secure a slate-test medium. Good vocal and instrumental music. Officers of association will be elected for ensuing year. We extend an invitation to all to participate, regardless of belief, assuring them of courteous treatment. As we maintain a free platform, all are invited to speak their honest convictions. Friends, come the first day of the meeting. All will be entertained free as far as possible. WM. M. LOCKWOOD, Pres't,

DR. J. C. PHILLIPS, Sec'y.

Book Notices.

"THE LABOR DOLLAR." By Stephen Pearl Andrews. Reprinted from the Radical Review. Benj. R. Tucker, publisher. Price, 10 cents. For sale at this office.

In reprinting this essay in pamphlet form Mr. Tucker has done a good deed. It is probably the clearest and most rational attempt at defining a proper "unit of value" that has been made. Mr. Andrews is well known to be considerably, if not utterly, abstruse when upon his favorit topic of the universe, and few there be, save such as are thought to be self-deluded, that claim to understand him; but when, on occasions like the present, he allows the finite to get the better of the infinit, and discourses upon subjects of contemporaneous human interest, he is certain to add something new and valuable to the sum total of human knowledge. "The Labor Dollar" first appeared some three years ago, but enjoyed only the circulation to be gained by the limited number printed of the Review in which it was published, and the questions with which it deals are perhaps no nearer their final settlement now than they were then. All efforts, therefore, to establish an equitable "unit of value" will continue to be regarded with growing interest, and especially so when writers of unquestioned aud unexcelled scholarship, like Mr. Andrews, hav contributed the fruits of their study toward a solution of the problem.

THE North American Review for September opens with an article on "The Church, the State, and the School," by Prof. William T. Harris. M. J. Savage treats of "Natural Ethics," showing that the principles of morality are rooted in man's nature, and are the products of evolution; consequently, that they are not affected by the vicissitudes of dogmas or religious creeds. The Hon. John A. Kasson givs a history of the "Monroe Declaration," and proves that the credit of formulating that cardinal doctrin of American statesmanship it due to John Quincy Adams. The Rev. Edward Everett Hale writes of the "Taxation of Church Property." He would hav all churches taxed in form, but would exempt in practice those which by their charitable work help to lighten the public burdens; in other words, he lets his feelings override his reason. The other articles in this number of the Review are, "Jewish Ostracism in America," by Nina Morais; "The Decay of New England Thought," by the Rev. Julius H. Ward; "Ghost Seeing," by Prof. F. H. Hedge; and "Factitious History, by Rossiter Johnson. The latter article is a scathing criticism of Jefferson Davis's recently-published historical memoir. Fifty cents per year. Five dollars per year. Address the North American Review, New York, N. Y.

PORTRAIT OF D. M. BENNETT.—We are obliged to our friends of the New York TRUTH SEEKER for a large lithograph portrait of Mr. D. M. Bennett, its absent editor, who is now on his long voyage around the world. The portrait is a good one—natural and life-like—and will no doubt find many purchasers.—Investigator.

WE are in receipt of a large-sized lithograph of D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, which will delight the eyes of his thousands of friends all over the country. It is a good likeness, and will serve to keep his memory bright while he is off on his trip around the world, outdoing the famed Capt. Cook, and writing home letters for THE TRUTH SEEKER full of minute information concerning the countries, and particularly the churches he visits abroad. When the miserable Comstock began to persecute Bennett he expected to destroy him, root and branch. Instead of doing that he made for him a host of friends throughout the country and advertised and extended his business. The expenses of this trip around the world are defrayed by scores of doughty Infidels, each of whom is to receive one or more copies of his book of travels, after it is published from the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are glad that Bennett has lived to triumph over his enemies and realize the appreciation of his friends, and we wish him a happy and prosperous journey.—Winsted Press.

Obituary.

Hannah Dixon passed to the spirit world (or some would say died) from the residence of her son-in-law, John Sichter, in Warren, Ohio, Aug. 13th, aged 74 years. Mrs. Dixon had been a life-long Liberal. When informed that her earthly journey was drawing to a close, she said that she would prefer to die as she had lived, without the interference of a minister. She preferred no prayers over her body, nor any funeral oration from a theological standpoint. Her sons, son-in-law, and daughter, all being Liberal, sent for the writer, who discoursed on death and the after life. MOSES HULL.

New York, Aug. 10, 1881. HUGH B. BROWN, Treasurer.

The German Press and Comstock.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: To-day's Westliche Post, a German newspaper of this city, republished an article of the New Yorker Zeitung, a German newspaper of your city, that relates to a bill pending before the Legislature of the state of New York. The article, translated, reads:

"The general opinion, without an exception, may be that the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and particularly its chief instrument, Anthony Comstock, does more mischief than good; the espionage with regard to letters they practice is alone sufficient to condemn them in the eyes of every right-minded man. The object of the bill in question is to empower Anthony Comstock and the other agents of the society, without judicial warrants and according to their own opinion, to make arrests at any place and at any time. A society that can even conceive the idea of claiming for itself such a despotic measure, threatening individual liberty to the utmost, is far more dangerous and far more deserves to be suppressed than the vice it endeavors to suppress. If our legislators hav not lost all common sense yet the passage of this bill cannot be thought of."

Very respectfully yours, JOHN GEO. HERTWIG.

Our sincere thanks are extended to those friends who hav kindly sent in their five dollars to help us around the world. We trust none will regret the investment. D. M. B.

LET thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. Turn not to the right hand nor to the left; remove thy feet from evil.—Proverbs, iv., 24–27.

Communications.

Among the Rome City Christians.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: "Bible," "Christianity," "God," "religion," "Jesus," were showered over my unbelieving head for five days; a Noachian deluge, a drenching torrent, with all the variation, the words like pattering hail-stones fell. Frequently Infidelity was led out and slaughtered by some meek divine. Rev. D. W. Moffatt, D.D., was announced to deal with "skepticism inside the modern church." The same gentleman cut "Materialism" up into mince-meat. Rev. Dr. Pierson discoursed upon "Snares of Skepticism." He was advertised to giv also, "Infidelity from the Side of Reason." Another, "Infidelity from the Side of Experience." From the statement of those subjects it will be seen that the church fears its greatest foe. Remember, too, it is always this same cowardly church that is crying out, "Don't attack us; let us alone; advocate your own views and abstain from demolishing ours." A large share of the effort at this Christian assembly was expended in opposing Freethought, Darwinism, evolution; and a great deal of pious fun was poked at Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and other nobodies. The bright and witty allusions to the weak points of Darwinism called forth ripples of religious laughter. It is a peculiar kind—subdued like.

Here are a few profound utterances of the D.D's.: Dr. A. T. Pierson said: "Skepticism is very subtle." "He who should take the utterances of skepticism and try to harmonize them might as well form an orchestra from the groans and squeaks of a thousand steamboat whistles."

This from a man that belongs to one of the hundreds of quarreling, screaming sects! In Freethought no groans of damned souls are heard. They are peculiarly an orthodox cargo. No two Christian sects can agree upon the exact route to heaven.

Rev. P.: "I consider one of the most common snares of skepticism is simple vanity."

But in addition to vanity the Christian is troubled with simple selfishness. Every Christian is vain enough to suppose he is fit stuff out of which to make an angel, and selfish enough to want his sect in heaven, and all others in the universe to take back seats.

Rev. P.: "Sometimes the severest of all measures which can be adopted toward a blatant skeptic or noisy Infidel is simply to let him alone."

He did not seem to know that he was violating his own doctrin. Why did he not let him alone? That is the way with the preachers, they argue against argument. If they succeed they fail, and if they fail they fail anyway. Poor, self-stultifying shepherds of scampering sheep! They might as well try to sweep back the ocean with Mrs. Partington's new broom as to hinder the overflow and spread of Liberalism, which is destined to engulf Christianity, Noah, Ark, Jonah, whale, and all.

Rev. P.: "The veriest fool may affect to criticise."

Mr. Pierson criticises Infidelity. Ergo.

Rev. P.: "The appetite for dispute is a snare into which many a man has fallen, and through it into skepticism. There are those who are by nature intellectual Ishmaelites; . . . they naturally take to doubt as a duck takes to water."

It is a sign of the decay of Christianity that it shuns debate; it fears agitation and controversy as a cat dreads the fire. But the gentleman's Jesus was very fond of controversy. Paul disputed daily in the market-places and in the synagogs (they were more free than modern churches). Stephen, the first Christian martyr, was a rousing debater. Too bad that Jesus and his apostles did not find out that by engaging in disputation they were laying snares of skepticism!

Another of the annointed said to the congregation, "We shall never argue Infidelity out of the world."

Look at the inconsistency of Christianity. It expends millions to argue heathenism out of the world; but here is something, right at home, which it confesses is to strong for it in argument. Hundreds of the Christian clergy are Infidels so far as the inspiration of the Bible is concerned, and the church itself is honey-combed with doubt. It has become a coward; dares not face and argue down its own doubts.

Rev. P.: "Skepticism spreads a net for the unwary in the very positivness of its utterances."

Your objection hitherto has been its "negativness." You are hard to please.

Rev. P.: "A very small portion of mankind do the thinking for all the rest."

Too true. And the sorriest set of men on earth are the clergy, because the people are, more than ever, doing their own thinking. Even a poor man who does a poor job of thinking on his own account discovers that it is better than good-for-nothing thinking done for him by an hired clergyman.

Rev. P.: "Men know there is a God, Atheistic argument to the contrary notwithstanding."

How? Your Bible god is proved a myth. Hav you any other?

Rev. P.: "Get evil out of a man's heart and you hav already got Infidelity out of his head."

That is a specimen of theological anatomy. Get Christian scrofula out of a man's blood, and you put common sense all through his brain.

Rev. P.: "Men prefer to sin."

The clergy ought to know their own history. As applied to the mass of people it is not true.

And such as this passes for able preaching, and is highly salaried.

Several other of the most learned of college professors and D.D's. expressed themselvs in a similar vein. One said, "Nothing but the Christian religion can giv hope to the mother in the dying hour of her daughter."

People who can express such thought (so entirely contrary to fact) ought to hav missionaries among them.

Said another, "Palsied be the hand that would rob the Christian of his hope!"

They clutch their faith as if they were already in the throes of dissolution. Do they feel their approaching doom? We are glad, for their sakes, that, while they see nothing ahead but the black clouds of doubt, the sunshine of knowledge will burst through and they will then wonder, as thousands who were once Christians do wonder, how they ever could hav been satisfied with the childish things of the church. As a matter of course, the mixing of science with superstition will giv the latter respectability. The leaders of the Christian movement congratulate themselvs on their sagacity; but, after all, the watching Liberal perceives that every atom of science taken into the chruch, to support the falling edifice, will prove, in the end, the nitroglycerin which will explode faith.

Organization.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In this day and age of the world when so many men and women are seeking after truth instead of blindly "following after strange Gods" that hav only such attributes as undeveloped conditions in society produce in the minds of many, there is much said in reference to organization. And various attempts hav been made to form an organization that would embody as much of truth as man alone could perceive, the last attempt being known as the Liberal League. But even this does not seem to satisfy those who hav labored so hard to make it national in character. Internal difficulties or external influences seem to turn many of its members away from the truth, instead of keeping their eyes on its bright and shining light, which fact leads us to question the solidity of the basis on which it rests.

In the order of nature, to produce harmonious evolution, or revolution, the positiv and negativ forces balance each other, and these correspond to the centrifugal and centripetal forces that are ever equally operating where harmonious results are produced.

And to awaken thought, perhaps criticism, I desire to add my "mite" on this all-engrossing subject in many minds.

Society is make up of homogeneous elements that express themselvs in as many different ways as there are individuals composing it, no two acting exactly alike any more than they look exactly alike, although in general outline they all resemble each other, and at the same time hav to depend on each other to run the machinery of life in a greater or lesser degree in harmony with surrounding conditions and relations, thus proving the truth of the saying, "The head cannot say to the hands, I hav no need of thee; or the hands to the feet, We hav no need of you;" head, hands, and feet, as well as heart and all the internal viscera, being necessary to make perfect the human organism. And the same law holds equally good in reference to the absolute needs of society, which is only the human organism duplicated or multiplied.

Cannot the clear-minded man or woman gather from this simple statement of fact a lesson in reference to organization worthy of imitation? Let us look at this subject unbiased by selfishness or self-seeking, and see if it is not capable of clearly illustrating the true principle of organization, because based on truth's immutable laws.

First, the proper motto for such an organization would be, Truth's immutable law, or exact justice for all men, women, and children. Second, its watch-word, Free thought, free speech, and free action, to insure mental liberty for all, the young as well as the old and middle-aged.

Its code of laws based on the highest, holiest, noblest, and purest aspirations that the human soul is capable of evolving.

Its code of morals, the Golden Rule actualized in all its business transactions, as well as in the physical, mental, moral, and spiritual desires and necessities of those who belong to or help form such an organization.

Its social observances not to invade the rights of others knowingly, or allow them to invade our rights.

Its sexual needs, the caressing manifestation of all genial, loving souls with whom they come in contact to cement the bond of union between them.

Its sexual rights to repel any advance that is not genial to one's spiritual intuitions, moral status, or affectional desires.

Its sexual necessities, the central love of one true mate. And no man or woman can ever hav but one; all union that is complete, being the result of the attraction that ever exists between the positiv and negativ principles, and this duality in its perfect action ever forms an indestructible union in the spiritual forces, this action being known as chemical affinity.

Its mental needs, the genial association daily of worthy and progressiv souls.

Its mental rights, to hav the opportunity to unfold and perfect any gift or gifts any one may possess, whether of a physical, mental, moral, or spiritual character.

And in an organization of this character there can be no "drones," and carry out its code of morals embodied in the Golden Rule; the different degrees of capacity only making the duties each owes to the others more or less onerous.

"But," says one, "there are but few on the earth at the present time that could liv out such exalted ideas of life and society." Admitting this to be true, should this hinder those few from reaping the benefits that such a union of physical, mental, moral, and spiritual forces would giv? And would not these few stand out before the world as a bright and shining light that in time would attract others to that degree that they would resolve to "go and do likewise?" the union of precept and example, being much more teachable and attracting than precept alone.

"But," says one, "I cannot see how this will benefit the masses who are not ready to worship truth in lip and life instead of error." The tree is judged by the fruit it bears, and who can gainsay the fact that the "tree of knowledge" is capable of bearing better fruit every way than the tree of ignorance, whose fruit lies all about in undeveloped conditions and inharmonious relations, consequently disease, sorrow, misery, and early decay and death stare us in the face on every side.

"But," says one, "who will set this ball in motion?" They who perceive its adaptation to the absolute needs of the human soul.

"Who among the masses are qualified to direct its evolution?" asks another. We answer, they who are the most gifted in any required direction, be it representing head, hands, or feet. There are always some better adapted to occupy responsible positions than others, and let adaptability, united with corresponding capacity, be the touch-stone to success in any given direction.

"But," says one, "how are we to know that they can succeed?" We answer, by actual demonstration, in a small way at first, and enlarge and unfold the boundaries of use as increased capacity makes it desirable or necessary.

"But," says the captious critic, "one is apt to grow proud and overbearing by continued success." Not if they take the Golden Rule for their only guide and leader, as a law of life.

It is not the bigot or the ambitious self-seeker that can worthily work in such an organization, so of course will not be allowed to try to fill any responsible position until they hav outgrown both their bigotry and selfishness.

"Then, who can occupy responsible positions in such an organization?" clamor many voices. We humbly and reverently answer, they only who are willing to renounce the world and its allurements, and liv for truth and truth only. While it (truth) knows no favorits, only its honest, sincere, and devout worshipers can worthily fill any responsible position in an organization that has for its base, as well as superstructure, the immutable laws that govern and control its activities, whether they hav reference to man or all below him in the scale of pure and perfect development.

Charitable Institutions.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Are not the Liberals in the United States strong and able enough to found and hav of their own an orphan asylum, and with it an old lady's home? The latter would be a service to the former in many ways. Such a home should be located in the country. I think Virginia the best state, as land could be bought cheap in that state. I would not suggest over one hundred acres; less would do. All that are able, be it much or little, to be taught to be useful. The children to be instructed under a systematic course of certain hours for a certain occupation, so as to be useful to themselvs and the commonwealth hereafter.

By locating the home in the country, I think, with right management, after a few years the home will be self-supporting to a large degree. What is wanted is plain, healthy buildings, not too large at first. Let us creep first.

Now, can we not set the good work afloat and make a beginning? Better an humble one than none at all. I think as time goes on, parties seeing the necessity for the object will come forward and lend their aid.

Must the Deist and Infidel, in case of death and misfortune, go back to the generosity of the orthodox church and avail themselvs of their charity for the fatherless children and the aged mother?

Yes, there are poor in the Liberal ranks, and they ought to be cared for. If the Liberals don't come forward and do good work the same as the church people, then I, for one, say let us hush up and don't destroy the charity that the church builds up.

Charity covers a multitude of sins. Think not, matter-of-fact Deist, that in your wisdom you ought not to be poor, for to-day we may be comfortable, a few years hence we may be poor.

We build no churches, we pay no priests; can't we afford to do a good work? or do the Liberals wish to recruit the church through her orphanages? The Masonic order has an old man's home, as also the Independent Order of Oddfellows. But a man must believe in God to enjoy their society. The old Infidel, if poor, can take the county poorhouse.

Well, I hope it will not always be so. I hope there are as many noble hearts in the Liberal ranks as in the church. The trouble is lack of organization and an object to work on. What truer object than the helpless children or second childhood (old age)?

The writer will feel well recompensed if his effort is the means of awaking a slumbering community to an activ working for the good of humanity.

Hoping others will take up the subject, I remain,

Yours respectfully, B. F. Batt.

[From the San Francisco News Letter.]

The Last Convert.

Editor News Letter, Dear Sir: It is only at the earnest solicitation of the host of pious readers of your paper, and the settled conviction in my own mind of the important duty I owe to mankind in general, and to this commonwealth in particular, that I consent to emerge from my sacred retirement, and, from the News Letter temple of worship, to face once more the frowns of theological bigotry. I was engaged last Sabbath, as usual, in my sacred calling, and, as a parson (on whom the holy spirit had descended in a deluge), I was portraying to my large and delighted audience, in the most vivid colors, the beautiful scheme of salvation. I had raised the star of Bethlehem, overshadowed Mary, brought Christ into the world, had him crucified, taken him out of his tomb in three days, and sent him back to heaven loaded with the sins of the world. I had raised the devil, manufactured hell, stocked it with sulphur, filled it in with coal, fired up, and had raised the temperature to nearly a white heat, in the minds of my hearers. I had so worked upon the imagination of my followers, had brought them up to such a pitch of heavenly enthusiasm, that each and every one of them smelled hell, and heard the roaring billows of a fiery sea go rolling on to a shoreless eternity. I had drawn, with gentle hand, the wool of the bleeding lamb over their heaven-directed orbs, until, through the soft glamour of religion, they saw the jasper throne, the golden streets, and the gates of heaven standing slightly ajar. They saw, through my theological telescope, that hell was bridged over, and the gap over the roaring chasm spanned by the single plank of faith. They were in a state of beatific rapture. They were ready for anything. They would away their uncertain all here for a share in the certain hereafter. I had got them where I wanted them, and was about to pass around the contribution-plate, when an emissary of Satan, in the shape of a reporter for a small, obscure, religious penny paper, called the Pacific, rushed in and handed me a note, at the same time shouting: "Hallelujah! Good news! Glory to God! Hurrah!"

My congregation requested me to impart to them the blessed intelligence contained in the note. I opened it in eager haste. It was from the Christian firm of Moody & Co., and contained these words:

"My Dear Parson: Cease laboring. Go home, put on a dry shirt, and turn in. San Francisco is converted. Glory!"

I fell back in my pulpit stunned. If the news was true, my occupation was gone. The effect of the startling intelligence upon my people was sorrowful to behold. Every man instantly buttoned up his pocket, picked up his hat, and started for the door. I received but one answer to my entreaties for them to remain. It was, "No more money on a heavenly margin. Old man, we don't put up another cent. You can take the stock; if San Francisco is converted, we are safe enough." And every regenerated soul marched out without donating me a copper, leaving me in debt to the woman I board with.

It is the greatest shock I hav received since Bro. Kalloch forgave his enemy, and sent him home to glory. I left my sacerdotal robes in pledge with Bro. Hamilton for half a dollar, and crossed the ferry to ascertain the facts. It was too true. As I landed on the wharf the first indication of a converted city that I encountered was "Bro. Kentzel," one of her guardians. He was singing, "Oh, had I the wings of a dove, I would soar to my mansion above." I knew something was wrong if he wanted to soar. As I proceeded up town my worst fears were realized. The occupation of the San Francisco clergy was in danger of being entirely swept away by Moody & Co. Bro. Hemphill's salary had been reduced one thousand a year. His church had dispensed with its choir, and had discharged the organist. Bro. Sankey, with his syren song, had out-roared the organ, and beaten a whole choir at their own game. Bro. Hamilton's church had seceded from the presbytery, and, under the Unitarian banner, was walking a go-as-you-please match with Bro. Stebbins's church on the road to the New Jerusalem. The Young Men's Christian Association was organizing a Sunday-school for the board of brokers, with John Perry, Jr. for a superintendent. Frank Pixley had sent George Gorham an apology for his abuse; also tendering him the freedom of the city, if George should ever come this way. Mr. Pickering had doubled his subscriptions for the News Letter. Tom Fitch was holding prayer-meetings at the Union Club. Fred McCrellish had presented Bro. Moody with a plaster cast of Pixley's mule, accompanied by an affidavit from Gen. McComb, swearing it was taken from the original ass on which the Bible hero rode into Jerusalem. Col. Bee and Denis Kearney were walking arm in arm through the Chinese quarter of the city, singing, "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" Mayor Kalloch had resigned, and had hidden his penitent head beneath the empty benches of the Metropolitan Temple. Handsome George had refused to call an extra session of the Legislature, intending to force the Assembly to repeal the Debris Act and pass the Apportionment and Appropriation bills. Brady and Mannix had drifted away from the lobby on the receding waves of public opinion, completely wrecked in the treacherous undertow of politics. The murderer, Wheeler, was preparing to leap from the scaffold into the arms of Jesus, and the United States commissioner had sent a crew on board a ship without a fee. In all these alarming, overt acts of secession from the cause of wickedness I could see the finger of Providence and the hand of Moody.

And now I, as a minister of the gospel, ask my brother parsons, How long are we to tolerate the insufferable impudence, vanity, and egotism of this brace of carpet-baggers? We hav elegant temples, which were erected and dedicated to the unknown for the especial performance of our religious theatricals. And we were doing well, playing to fair houses every Sunday with paying patrons, until this pair of gospel distributers put in an appearance. And the lay of this last minstrel laid us out. We had "high-toned," standing-collar congregations, until two Shanghai roosters began to crow about the resurrection morn. We sold our religion. And there were "millions in it." But these two unsophisticated prodigals throw theirs away. They hav too much of it. They came here loaded with it, and they hav scattered it about until it has become worthless. They hav sung us a new song. No one ever heard it before. It is, "Come to Jesus." And the great unthinking masses catch it up and echo the wild refrain of "Come to Jesus." You hear it everywhere; in our churches, in our stock rooms, in our theaters, at the hour of meeting, at the Merchants' Exchange. Business is commenced with prayer, and the hardy adventurers that meet there daily, pious men who go down to the sea in ships, and do business on the great waters—they walk into the great grain mart with noiseless tread, bowed head, and a prayer on their lips, that the glory of God may go up and freights go down, so that the hungry millions in Europe may hav bread cheaper.

All this Moody and Co. hav accomplished, and much more. They hav trailed the purple and fine linen, flowing robes of a cultured clergy, in the dust of the common people. They hav dragged down to their own low level the gilt-edged theology of a refined society. They hav scattered the promises of "Jesus" all over Tar Flat, and washed the entire shore-line of Barbary Coast in the blood of the Lamb. Their tickets to heaven admit every one to a front seat, and without money. Preposterous! Who ever heard of a religious superstructure resting on any other foundation than a golden brick?

Who wants to go to heaven in company with men in their shirt-sleeves, trudging all the way on foot in a pair of $2.50 brogans? We don't. We want to go in full dress. We want to ride there in our family coach, with our coat-of-arms emblazoned on the panels, so the old residents may know who we are. We're in the ring—on the inside. We've made many a corner in the "New Jerusalem" stock market, and made other people keep our margins good. And we don't intend to be crowded out by Mr. Moody.

MOODY.

For weeks, in our ears, his trumpet he hath blown;
He hath told of a land of which nothing is known;
He hath sung of a savior no man ever saw:
He hath preached of an infinit God and his law;
But he, in his wisdom, hath never yet told
To us where the tide of humanity rolled,
When death settled down on its breast with a shiver,
And earth's weary children go down the dark river.
He prates of our beautiful home in the air,
Where the singing is sweet and the scenery rare.
We know we must go, but the question is, Where?
Through time's dusky ages the question hath rung
In the ears of earth's millions, but never a tongue
Hath answered that question, or showed us the road
That leads to the gate of our future abode.

It is easy to sing of a bright, golden shore,
And our mansion above, but just show us the door,
Then we'll come to Jesus if you'll show us in,
And be devilish glad to get rid of our sin.

Yours, moodily, The Parson.

Is the Human Will Free?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The following remarks were brought out by reading the communication on this subject by "A. B. B." in The Truth Seeker of Feb. 5th:

As a rule, mankind are taught in their infancy that the will is free, hence, as a rule, believe it, and even claim to be conscious of it; but no more fatal mistake to the happiness and well-being of mankind was ever made, for it is exactly the reverse of true, and breeds uncharitableness, hate, and vindictivness.

The will, instead of being a governing power, is wholly the subject of government, and acts just as it is acted upon, with greater force in some individuals and under some circumstances than others. Because a person can do in any case as he pleases is no evidence of freedom, for he must be just as able to do as he don't please if he is free, which is a contradiction in terms. A man never acts without an adequate motiv of action. He can never create a motiv for his own action. He is governed by motivs he can neither create nor control, hence his every act is the result of adequate forces bearing upon him. A man may create a motiv for the action of others, and others may create a motiv for his action, but neither can create a motiv for their own action, for they cannot go out from themselvs to do it.

Do not all philosophers and scientists admit this universal law of the physical, mental, moral, and emotional universe; that no effect can take place without an adequate cause; that causes and effects are always adequate to each other? To deny this principle would be to proclaim the rule of chance, which is no rule at all. To say one can do so and so if he pleases is equivalent to saying he can if he can; but if the will is free, we should hav to say, he can if he can't, which is nonsense. Remember that the will, to be free, must be independent of all extraneous forces; but as we cannot create a motiv for our own action, then how could the will act? Simply not at all. And what kind of freedom would that be? Simply freedom from action, which is an impossibility, except with a dead man.

But some will say, if the will is not free, then man is not morally accountable for his bad acts, and should not be so held. Well, never try to dodge a legitimate conclusion from your premises. The moral organization of a tiger, or lack of moral development in him, makes him a tiger, and his natural and appropriate acts are those of a tiger. His will is acted upon and governed by the most sordidly selfish motivs. Conscience, he has none, and no one thinks of holding him morally responsible for his acts, but only to keep him from hurting us. So with our criminals; from lack of conscience they are closely related to the tiger; their natural and appropriate tendencies, from their inherited organizations, are to crime; and all we can do with them is to keep them from hurting us, for we can neither educate nor legislate the tiger out of them; it is bred in them, and there it will stay. They are pitiable and unfortunate victims, not at all responsible for their organizations, but blasted with the withering curse of a bad heritage from bad prenatal conditions.

There never was a truer saying than this, "As is the organization, so is the man." A thief, liar, or robber has not a sufficient development of conscience, that involuntary emotion which is responsiv to intellectual perceptions of justice, and which prompts its possessor to do the just and right in preference to the unjust and wrong. So he invades and usurps the natural and just rights of others, and will not allow them the same rights he claims for himself if he can avoid it by hook or crook. Men and women conceived in lust and gestated in disgust and inharmony inherit organizations more or less aborted physically, mentally, morally, and emotionally, and having at most but weak developments of conscience, their wills are governed by sordidly selfish motivs, which result in more or less crime, according to their greater or less degree of bad organization.

So criminals are bred, and their wills are susceptible only to the force of sordidly selfish motivs, which is in perfect keeping with their inherited organizations. The religionist's hells are built on the false doctrin of the freedom of the will, but the real hells are inherent in the inherited organizations of mankind; and the only way mankind can get out of these hells, or rather get these hells out of them, is to breed them out according to the law of heredity; or, in other words, stop breeding criminals, and breed only men and women of good organizations by strict observance of the conditions necessary to that end.

Letters from Friends.

NEW YORK, June 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I will take ten or more shares of stock in the "Temple of Humanity." Permit me to state that I consider the noble undertaking of Courtlandt Palmer a failure, as no such amount can be raised at the present church-flourishing age to build such a structure, or even the foundation thereof, as proposed by Ingersoll Lockwood, as such a building only would be a real success. Too many rich, kind-hearted Liberals wear the church muzzle. Many of them are even church-members—"tacit Infidels."

My plan is to get temples of humanity, temples of liberty, and halls of learning gratis. Deprive the church of her power, and this will accomplish all. It will soon convert churches into temples of humanity, into temples of liberty, and into halls of learning; a noble change of uselessness to usefulness would be created. As soon as the church is powerless and taxed, the emancipation of an army of good Liberal men and women will take place and convert all the rest of the church-members into investigators and truth-seekers. That very power lies in the hands of the present slow-coach Liberals. A political Liberal party ought to be formed at once and go to work like good men. They hav been fooling and wasting away valuable time with nonsense too long. If Liberals continue to fool away valuable time I, for one, would say that lunatic asylums and state prisons are the most suitable places for them. Yours truly, M. REIMAN.

HANFORD, CAL., July 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th we find a letter from our friend Dr. J. L. York, who not long ago paid us a visit and delivered here a few lectures, which had the effect he wished, viz., to wake the people up and set them to thinking and quarreling. He made things lively while he staid with us, and proved himself to be a holy terror to priestcraft and religious bigotry generally. The writer of this was one of the most attentiv listeners, and is of the opinion that notwithstanding the great intellectual blight of Southern Methodism and that of Tennessee Presbyterianism, which abound here to a deplorable degree, some of the seeds of Liberalism which he sowed will take root and grow and bear fruit that will elevate the souls of mankind, and thereby glorify God. The doctor's remarks in his letter in regard to the Mussel Slough trouble and railroad surprised some of us, for we believed and yet think that he is willing to advocate the cause of justice, no matter what foes oppose it. The question is this, Has the railroad company obtained an honorable and legitimate title to the land that is under dispute? The majority of the American people say "no." We believe the title the railroad company has to those lands was obtained by fraud, misrepresentation, bribery, and corruption. Is it right, then, for honest men to recognize their claim or bow in humble submission to the dictates and terms of these plunderers of public property? We think not, and it is our opinion that the settlers' case is far from hopeless, because right must win. It is very hard to understand by what process of reasoning the doctor has come to the conclusion that the leaders of the movement against the railroad company are brainless demagogs. That kind of expression seems out of place when uttered by a Liberal and Freethinker. No one of Liberal ideas and sentiments should use such harsh language without a good reason for so doing. O. WHITNEY.

MR. BENNETT: Please find inclosed one dollar and fifty cents, for which you will please continue the wicked old TRUTH SEEKER. I am afraid something bad will happen to you or to your affairs at home while you are on your journey. Tell your folks to be very careful what they put in THE TRUTH SEEKER while you are absent. The church was too strong for Murphy's bill, and I am afraid it might be too strong for you. The vile Comstock laws will not be repealed nor even modified. History is repeating itself, and what has been will surely be again. Our government will follow in the wake of those that hav gone before. I will giv you my sentiments in round numbers. That system of religion known by the name of Christianity, under the two heads of Catholicism and Protestantism, is the biggest humbug and the greatest curse that has ever afflicted a suffering humanity. The only exception in history to the rule that the church in its might has always triumphed overright was the way in which you got the inside track on Mr. Mair when he denied the personality of a god and kept it ever since. I read the discussion with great interest. I think Mr. Mair is a right smart man, but he has met more than his match in you. Wishing you a happy trip, I am Yours, T. H. MONTGOMERY.

MOOERS, N. Y., Aug. 14, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The following anecdote may figure well in your paper:

A rough kind of a lad, induced by his young friends to go to Sunday-school, somewhat attracted the attention of the teacher, who at once requested him to stand up and answer questions. The boy arose, but not being accustomed to exhibiting himself in church was rather deficient in the respectful attitude and peculiar long face required in such a position. His unbecoming appearance developed some hilarity in his nearest neighbors, some of whom, inspired, no doubt, with Christian charity, went to prompting him up from his embarrassed position with pins, which method, as improper as it may seem at first, had a pretty good effect after all. "Who made you?" asked the teacher. Just then a pin entered the boy's flesh from behind, giving him quite an acute and painful sensation. He rubbed the affected part with his hand, exclaiming at the same time in a tone of anger, "God Almighty!" "Your answer is correct," said the teacher, "but don't get excited. Who was our redeemer?" At that moment that wicked pin was stuck again in that fleshy part where the spine loses its name. "Jesus Christ!" shouted the boy, again rubbing the wound. "You answer well," said the teacher, "but your tone is hardly proper in church. Compose yourself." He little knew what was going on below the railing. "Had it not been for the blood of the redeemer, what would hav been the destiny of man?" Another stab of the infernal pin. "Hell and damnation!" exclaimed the exasperated lad. "I admire your answers," said the teacher, but your delivery is execrable. Why can't you keep cool?" "Well," said the boy, who had not once thought of answering the questions, "I would like to see you keep cool with some one sticking pins in your—" "We will unite in prayer," interrupted the teacher, after which the school was dismissed for that day.

A Sabbath-school teacher traveled ten miles to tell me that praying to the Virgin Mary, as the Catholics do, is an insult to God, who prides in granting a just request without any interception whatever, and will not suffer himself to be teased into an unjust grant by all the Marys of heaven and of earth. When I informed him that I fully agreed with him that far, but that I could see the same amount of insult in praying to God direct, that prayer being nothing more nor less than prompting one to do what, if right, and he knows it, he ought to do without being told, or teasing him to do what he should not and will not do whether told or not told. Rev. Mr. Minckler returned home fully convinced that I was God-forsaken beyond redemption.

HORTON, MICH., July 25, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER: You remember in the olden time, when a fellow came late, very late, at the eleventh hour if I mistake not, and behold he got about as much as those who were there in and through the heat and burden of the day, and some were dissatisfied and said it wa'nt fair, and all that, and more, perhaps, but finally became reconciled, and so I hope you, as lord of "round-the-world" manor, will reconcile all your friends, and, if consistent with your plans on the trestle board, giv each a penny. I, at first, promised to giv you a "V" (to help you round the world) if I could, and now, at the eleventh hour, please find it inclosed. I hope it may find you before you go.

Please put me down as one of the immortal few who were willing to giv the "widow's mite" to help speed you round this world in search of the truth, which I am sure will prove the greatest treasure we could buy with our little mite. Oh, how I hope I may liv to receive it and read it. I am well started on my fourth score, as I believe you are, and it is a great undertaking for you, I know, but I hav faith in you, my brother.

I hope you may see fit to take an artist with you, unless you can do your own sketching, for I think it may make those volumes four times as profitable to you and us to hav them well illustrated. Hoping I may liv to see you coming through Michigan on your way home all safe and sound, permit me to write myself your friend and brother.

Fraternally, ISAAC SNYDER, M.D.

FARMINGDALE, ILL., June 23, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find postal order for $8—$3 for my TRUTH SEEKER for the present year and $5 for your trip round the world. I hav not made you any promis or any encouragement. Go on, old veteran, and if you don't find the people any better in the Old World, then interrogate Jehovah and find out what is the matter, for he is the creator and Alpha and Omega, then hold him to accountability. Our best wishes go with you on your long journey. Yours for truth, ALEX. ROGERS.

June 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been rather laxing in duty, but will try to do better hereafter. Inclosed find post-office order for my subscription for 1881, and $5 for your trip round the world. I hope you may hav a pleasant trip, get back to the land of childhood and spread good news and glad tidings as you hav for several years. Yours, O. W. HANNUM.

LEMOORE, CAL., June 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: We hav just been favored with a course of lectures from Dr. J. L. York—the first ever delivered in this place. That the public mind is almost intuitivly prepared to receive the truth cannot be doubted when a Liberal lecturer's audience, composed of the best intelligence and minds of all isms, increases every night, to listen to the truths of a bold and Radical character, as in this case of the doctor. The doctor is doing a mighty work for the Pacific coast. He sees and deeply feels that he is in the midst of a mighty harvest fully ripe, and that laborers are mighty few. The doctor possesses quite a happy way of bringing up the gods of science and placing them against the host of the mighty, forcing them back to their proper place among the ages of myths, and into their dismal abodes of fetich ignorance, as well as carrying you forward on the wings of evolution to a higher, purer, and happier sphere of existence. Yours truly, G. B. HAMLIN.

SALINA, KAN., July 19, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that you will start about August 1st. If I am ready I will meet you about that time, but I am afraid I shall not. We will see each other at Paris, anyhow. I see by the same the proposition of Roger de Goey, "A Freethought Cargo," proposing at Antwerp an establishment of a Freethinking colony, a Freethinking store of books for intending emigrants, and this project I find an excellent one. Its utility and necessity must strike the eyes of any intelligent man, and must obtain the aid of all Liberals. Mr. Bennett, you can make plenty for such an institution, which will necessarily hav some very good results for the propagation of Freethought all over the country, which needs it. I say the occasion is very well chosen. Poor emigrants hav nothing to pass the time away on the steamers but the Bible and holy books that hav been put in their pockets at Liverpool or elsewhere by some good Christian people. I wish you to mention my approbation of this project and to see it sustained in your paper. I will pay my subscription to the paper in crossing New York. If I don't see you I will see the office and your representativ.

Yours for federation all over the world,
JOSEPH HENRY.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Aug. 12, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: It is a considerable time since I addressed a few lines to your popular self. Our champion, friend, and editor is now on his world trip, and life and vigor should be thrown into your columns, spreading broadcast truth strong a n pungent, striking down deep in the recesses of each mind, and having the effect of bringing over thousands to the side of Freethought and out of the slough of superstition, and more especially that modern lunacy called Spiritualism, which deludes its dupes with a false hope of a phantom life in the sky. Bah! Every phase of supernaturalism is a fraud, but this Spiritism is the fraud of frauds; and the man or the paper which exposes its wild assumptions and anti-natural theories is entitled to the thanks of every honest man. There is not the first thing to prove that any life survived the wreck of death; and where no proof exists all statements are false, and the whole thing is untenable. Faith in things non-provable is the faith of fools; and if millions believe therein it proves nothing. What is a lie ever remains a lie, unchangeable. I challenge the whole pack of supernaturalists to prove that man livs in any phase after once dead. There is one life and one death, and that's all there is in it. We knew nothing before life, and we shall know nothing when life is extinct. This is solid truth, and must prevail. Nothing but ignorance and deceit can retard its progress. Sound sense and plain logic are on its side, and thousands privately believe this fact, but fear to openly express their honest convictions. But here is a champion Materialist, bold and fearless, with a conscious firmness that the whole and above truth is solid and unanswerable. T. WINTER.

AUBURN, N. Y., May 30, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $10, to pay for two shares in the "Around the World" fund, as per my promis, which, as I understand, entitles me to two sets of books. I can only use one set, and will let the other share go toward purchasing some of your other useful publications, which are so very instructiv to the truth seeker in the way of opening up new channels of thought which hav heretotore been lying dormant in the crucibles of Christian intolerance and religious bigotry.

Every day of my life I am becoming more mindful of what unfathomable depths of ignorance man has waded through for eighteen hundred years; how for Christ's sake the human race hav groaned in agony, withered in misery, died in indescribable torture. Oh, in just a word let me say when I contemplate for a moment this sad catastrophe it makes my heart beat with all its pulsation, my veins swell faster and quicker, and my heart's blood run cold with indignation! Oh, how this world and its race hav been imposed upon! Terrible, terrible to behold! Agonizing to think of! It is humanity that has suffered for Christ, not Christ for humanity.

Now you are to start soon to circumnavigate our planet. I hope and I am satisfied that you will giv the world the greatest production of its kind that has yet been written, and that without the aid of divine inspiration. In times gone by travels round the world hav been written by Christians and to please Christians, who are notorious for writing anything and everything, true or false, in order that their false system may be strengthened and perfected thereby. With an Infidel to the Christian religion, we are sure to get the facts just as they are, not having any system of religion to cherish or defend. I think we shall come into the possession of truths concerning the popular Christian religion which will startle us and set us to thinking once for ourselvs.

It seems to me, Bro. Bennett, that one year is not time sufficient to visit all those countries of scriptural import. I want you to make a thorough visit and giv a complete account of those ancient lands. Be sure to giv us a concise description of all the interesting Bible accounts, such as Mount Ararat, upon which old father Noah's box rested much above perpetual frost and snow; also the mountain where the devil alighted with Jehovah and held their interview; the spot where Jesus fed five thousand people with seven loaves and two fishes; the very place where Judas hanged himself, and where he fell and his bowels gushed out; the identical spot where the swine ran headlong into the sea; where Abraham offered up Isaac; the place where Jesus was buried and arose the third day, and whether it was Jerusalem or Galilee into which he went in unto the Gentiles; where Lot committed incest with his daughters; where the poor, peaceful Midianites were entirely destroyed by the Israelites, save 32,000 young virgins, which were kept alive for the beastly and amorous lusts of the soldiers of the Almighty; the Garden of Eden, where God, of infinit wisdom, omnipotent and omniscient, made a gigantic failure in his first attempt at creation; and last of all, but not least, just where the immaculate conception was consummated, and how it was brought about.

This supernatural method, I am afraid, will forever remain a mystery to us. I cannot understand why the Almighty Jehovah should hav dispensed entirely with the man and not the woman. Why did he not do away with both and speak Jesus into existence, which would hav left us much less mystified? I shall forever believe that Jesus was begotten the same as I was—by actual, visible, human, sexual cohabitation. This is my belief, hell or no hell.

Yea, Bro. Bennett, I hope you will giv the world some light upon this important subject, which is today agitating the mind, and which has for many centuries made enemies instead of friends. Let us love truth more and error less. The more we believe in the crude absurdities of the old Jewish book and its alleged author, God, the less we will love man and all that is real, beautiful, and good.

Really, it is a great undertaking for you to set out upon so vast an enterprise. You may never liv to return to your many dear friends who are now battling for the right with you. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will not suffer in your absence. I don't think it will. I, for one, will continue to renew my subscription, and when at leisure will occasionally add to its columns. I hope every subscriber will do the same, and when our champion returns home to greet us once more he will be surprised to learn what strides we hav made in its subscription list, also its financial department.

Should I not write you again before your departure round the world, you may depend on my fidelity to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the glorious cause which it fearlessly advocates, ever striking asunder the hydra-headed monster of superstition, fostered by an ignorant, credulous race, who hav become the victims of the gross imposition practiced upon the world in the name of revealed religion.

Hoping that your better half will remain well and happy in your continued absence, and that she may once more greet your return home in renewed health and vigor, and that there will yet be many years for both of you to mingle together, feeling that the world and its people hav been greatly benefited by your influence, I am ever, Yours truly,

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

DAYTON, O., June 27, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: We hav quite an excitement in our neighborhood just now, in regard to church matters. In the first place the German Reformed church, called David's church, after D. Winters, D.D., has turned out fifteen members for non-payment; the next is an excommunication of a prominent young lady belonging to the church, for riding around with a brother, and finally having a girl baby, which is charged to him. They are considered some of our best citizens. They are about to turn all members out of church who do not attend regularly and pay up.

We hav still another church in our neighborhood quarreling about church affairs, electing officers, etc. Some are likely to quit the church. They had scarcely a choir to sing last Sunday.

Your friend, W. K. GERHARD.

BURNIP'S CORNERS, MICH., June 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find money to pay for the June 11th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I hav lost the copy of that date and don't want to lose it entirely. I loan the paper far and near among all the orthodox as well as Freethinking friends that I can prevail upon to read it, and think I hav the gratification of knowing that I hav absolutely converted some of my friends who leaned on both sides of the fence, and worked a perceptible change in some of the orthodox side at the same time, and that is how I lost the missing number off my file. I collect them all in as soon as they begin to be worn and mutilated and lay them carefully away for future ammunition to fight old orthodoxy and barbarianism with; and also for the useful intelligence in science and reason they contain. I am very sorry I cannot at present subscribe to that round-the-world fund, but may meet fortune and health some day.

Yours for spreading truth and reason, F. E. S.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 24, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: In a few days you will say good-bye to the grandest people and country on this earth, and may your trip be one of prosperity and happiness to you most complete.

With best wishes, IRVING C. TERRY.

FABIUS, N. Y., July 23, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find $3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. How I wish I could send $5.00 for the round-the-world trip, but sickness and death hav depleted my purse. I am compelled "to seek first for the kingdom" that furnishes bread and butter. Accept, then, the will for the deed. We can't do without the paper, even though fortune frowns upon us. We anticipate much pleasure in reading your letters from foreign and benighted lands since we've had a foretaste from the letters of "An Infidel Abroad."

I should hav renewed my subscription before, but poverty has been my master, and bread and butter we must hav. Though you hav been victimized and imprisoned by so-called Christians in the land of your nativity, it will ever be a sweet consolation to you in knowing you hav the lasting sympathies of hundreds of thousands, as evinced in that monster petition for your release from an unjust confinement. As you hav become a marked man at home, and your prospectiv journey is pretty generally known, It may be advisable for you to be on your guard at all times and look out for spies, assassins, or even missionaries abroad, for the church has heretofore executed diabolical plots, and all for the sake of Christ, who came, not to bring peace, but a sword. It is not the heathen's rage we fear in regard to your safety, nor that of the dreaded Mussulman, but rather the Jesuits of Protestants and Catholics.

Desiring that your health may continue good during your absence, that friends may greet you elsewhere, and that you may be able to giv us as correct a history of your travels as was that of the ten weeks in Europe, we shall wait for your return anxiously though patiently.

Your friend, HOMER A. BILLINGS.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., July 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $6, for which send B. F. Underwood's works, and $5 for your trip around the world. I hav been wanting to add my name to the honorable list for some time, but did not hav the money to spare, but I trust that I am not too late yet. I hope that you will hav a successful voyage. Yours truly, W. D. CURTIS.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: To all who advise thee to stay at home we respectfully reply that one good reason for thy going away is that thou will be out of the reach of that arch fiend Comstock, the persecution of cruel Christians, and the horrible American bastile, for a few months.

The term "prophet" originally signified poet. Perhaps it has changed its meaning to prophet for profits?

We claim true prophetic foresight as far as penetrating the future is concerned far excelling all of Yahweh's poets.

To prove this, allow us to refer thee to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Vol. VII., No. 1, p. 14:

> "The Infidel prisoner's fame will be sounded,
> And wafted triumphant to every shore,
> By legions of truth-loving friends be surrounded,
> And treacherous enemies harm thee no more."

Thy writing in prison and in Europe, and thy future productions to the end of life, will surely and fully justify the prediction that

> "Thy pages with truth and philosophy glowing > Will cheer and illumin man's path to the grave."

Shouldst thou die in a strange land "Pope's Elegy" will be very applicable to thy case:

> "By foreign hands his dying eyes were closed,
> By loving hands thy mortal frame reposed,
> By Infidels his foreign grave adorned,
> By strangers honored, and by strangers mourned."

Were Spiritualism true we would silently invoke the aid of angelic beings to shield and protect thee from all danger and harm, and return thee renewed in age and vitality, increased in knowledge and wisdom, and intellectually prepared to triumph over all falsehoods, superstitions, bigotry, persecutions, bastiles, death, hell, and the grave. So mote it be. Farewell. Yours truly, E. N. KINGSLEY.

ALTON, ILL., Aug. 25, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I send postal money order for $5 for your trip round the world. I hope you will receive it in time. I hope the eleventh hour is not too late to do thee good. I am one of your oldest subscribers, and hav not missed a single number, and hav read every paper that you hav sent. Capt. Harry Starr, my son-in-law, is as much taken up with the paper as I am. I hav no more time to write, for I liv about two miles from the post-office.

WM. A. GRAVES.

MILLERTON, CAL., Aug. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for the round-the-world trip. I would hav sent it before if I could possibly. I am not the only one that has been prevented.

D. M. Bennett will need a good sum to help him zig-zag through the Western states and territories after landing at San Francisco.

Yours truly, GEORGE PADDINGTON.

MT. PLEASANT, PA., Aug. 8, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Would it not be well if the friends in their letters would impart what they know concerning the finds in their localities of prehistoric times? It would impart a vast amount of knowledge in a year, and be extremely interesting. The letter of E. W. Cressey, on page 509, would make a fair sample. Yours truly, W. F. BARKLEY.

SAN JOSE, CAL., June 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Find inclosed money order for $5 for your trip round the world. I would hav sent the amount at first call in THE TRUTH SEEKER if my donation had been noticed when I wrote you to put me down on your list for $5. My name never appeared among the list of names until very lately, so I gave the matter no further attention. At last, my donation being acknowledged, I hasten to respond.

Sincerely yours, R. H. SCHWARTZ.

MORAVIA, IOWA, July 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I donate $5 to bring you back to America sound and glittering. Add my name to the list, and if your money runs out whilst looking for God's family let us know it, and we can buy you a passage home again. Then come around and see us. Respectfully yours, H. G. JUDSON.

Ho! for Hornellsville.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Liberals should cultivate comradeship. If we can't organize we can at least associate. If we cannot be of one mind we can be of one spirit. It is this spirit—this enthusiasm that comes from mental contact—which is the need of the hour. Liberalism is an immense thing; it is a vast revolution, and it is no wonder that those who sweep along its tide hav a thousand different outlooks; but the same fresh morning bursting with a million flames is the beacon-light of all.

We must make the world feel our power; we must be like so many sticks put in a bundle not easily broken.

Liberalism seems a muddle to some, but by union it will become in the eyes of all a clear crystal, and then it can pour all its glory upon the world.

After all we are but atoms. In ourselvs we are not the cosmos. We can make that only by the coming together of atoms. A thousand atoms at Hornellsville will make quite a brilliant constellation.

Let the law of attraction compel us thither, that we may giv and take of our best, and keep the wheels of progress in motion. Let us strike hands and we shall become giants, and to all old fogies terrible as an army with banners.

Let us hav a grand encampment, with music and banners, and giv "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together."

I hope that everyone will go. According to Vennor the weather will be splendid, cool and comfortable; and now that the railroads are fighting we can go to Hornellsville by way of Chicago for almost nothing. It's a good time to travel—not Jordan, for no matter how cheap the fare, that's always a hard road to travel—but the path of liberty, science, and humanity.

Hornellsville is the rallying-spot, and no doubt in a few years we shall come three hundred thousand strong. Let us be the advance guard of this great host.

No Liberal should stay at home who can go; for neither books nor papers can giv the life of one such grand meeting. Home will be sweeter because we shall return to it with fresh and exalted minds.

A goodly—if not godly—number should go from New York and vicinity. Newark, Paterson, and other points of Liberalism should be represented. We expect to see Frankel and Warr and their compeers. Of course Wakeman and Palmer and Leland and McDonald will be there, and why should not the rest of us follow suit?

That is what I propose to do, and I hope to see a large delegation from the metropolis of the world to greet the Hub with the right hand and the great West with the left. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

I PROTEST that if some great power would agree to make me always think what is true and do what is right, on condition of being turned into a sort of clock and wound up every morning before I got out of bed, I should instantly close with the offer. The only freedom I care about is the freedom to do right; the freedom to do wrong I am ready to part with on the cheapest terms to any one who will take it of me. —Huxley

A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE. Mr. Bennett's letters from abroad. $1.50.

There is No God.

Poor fools! wild dreamers! No, there is no God;
Yon heaven is deaf and dumb to prayer and praise;
Lo, no almighty tyrant wields the rod
For evermore above our hapless race;
Nor fashioned us, frail creatures that we be,
To bear the burden of eternity.

Hear it, self-torturing monks, and cease to wage
Your mad, delirious, suicidal war;
There is no devil who from age to age
Waylays and tempts all souls of men that are;
Forever seeking whom he may devour,
And damn with wine and woman, gold and power.

Deluded priests, ye think the world a snare,
Denouncing every tender human tie!
Behold, your heaven is unsubstantial air,
Your future bliss a sick brain's phantasy;
There is no room amid the stars which gem
The firmament for your Jesusalem.

Rejoice, poor sinners, for I come to tell
To you who hardly dare to liv for fright,
There is no burning everlasting hell
Where souls shall be tormented day and night;
The fever ye call life ends with your breath;
All weary souls set in the night of death.

Then let your life on earth be life indeed!
Nor drop the substance, snatching at a shade!
Ye can hav Eden here! ye bear the seed
Of all the hells and heavens and gods ye made
Within that mighty world-transforming thought
Which permeates the universe it wrought—

Wrought out of stones and plants and birds and beasts,
To flower in man, and know itself at last
Around, about you, see what endless feasts
The spring and summer bountifully cast!
"A vale of tears," ye cry—if ye were wise,
The earth itself would change to Paradise.

The earth itself—the old despised earth,
Would render back your love a thousandfold,
Nor yet afflict the sons of men with dearth,
Disease, and misery, and drouth and cold;
If you would seek a blessing in her sod,
Instead of calling vainly on your God.

Cast down the crucifix, take up the plow!
Nor waste your breath which is the life in prayer!
Dare to be men, and break your impious vow,
Nor fly from woman as the devil's snare!
For if within, around, beneath, above
There is a living God, that God is Love.

The Genius of Mind.

BY R. R. HALL, M. D.

What is this wonder-working power of mind
That chisels genius on the granit tower
And marble dome? That tunnels mountains through,
And climbs their rugged sides, and delves beneath
Their rocky base in search of hidden gold
And rough, uncut diamonds? Did it commence
With embryotic life when form began,
Or had it origin far back in time
To where matter and force coeternal
And coexistent did commence to form
And shape the world on which we liv, and those
That gem as pearls the coronet of night?
If time gave birth to flowers of mind that bloom
Through form, then time will write its epitaph;
For only that which knows no beginning
Knows no ending. Mind, matter, and force,
The triune with which the eternal years
Hav wrought and changed to form all that the eye
Beholds, from violet in shady dell
To orb that rolls dispensing light and heat,
Giving to earth its greenest robes of spring,
And to the summer time a promis rich
That autumn reaps in ripe, golden harvest.
And here again we ask what is this power?
This power whose life we trace along the line
That takes us back to read from ruins old
The fading history of time forgot.
Forgot in all save in her ruins, and they
With age are dying too, for years revolving
Shall wear away the chisel marks when stone
Shall change to sand. But thou thyself shalt liv
When tower and dome and ruins all shall sleep
In mingled dust. Oh, who can tell the deep
And hidden laws that thou may yet unfold!
Thy genius weighs the stars and revels 'mid
The dance of worlds; and running rills and flames
Of fire at thy command are yoked, subdued,
And made to serve the world. Floating palace
And rattling car are thy abode for man
To travel round the world. The Press, thy child,
Whose voice in manhood's strength and accents clear
Proclaims the "higher law" "that right makes might,"
Is heard through all the world; and devotees
Are flocking to and drinking in the grand new truth
That's marking out the onward line of march
In which the millions yet shall learn to go,
With reason for their guide and nature for
Their moral code. O thou mighty genius
Whose inspiration seeks for truth through law
That governs the unbounded universe,
It's hung in air above the solid earth
And laid beneath the waves on ocean's bed,
Cold iron nerves, and sent through them the thrill
Of life that beats with magic power of speech.
It has made of the sunbeam an artist
That paints both form and feature true to life.
But most wonderful of all its workings,
And most valued of all its treasures,
Is its crowning glory of memory;
Those living, speaking, immortal tablets
That hold the record of our childhood's life
And takes e'en age back to play-grounds sunny
And bright, and calls up forms and faces dear
That sported with us these long years ago
On sloping hills first kissed by spring's warm rays.
There bloomed the violet and daffodil,
And there sang the bluebird and the robin,
The first and welcomed songsters of the year;
And there the meadows green that stretched away
Where grasses and the daisies mingling grew;
The mountain and the bounding brook, they too
Are there; and the sweet song that waters make
As they glide over the bright sand and roll
Among the pebbles polished by their roll
Is still singing on its way to the sea;
And the old rude school-house of logs and mud,
Whose pupils sat on benches hard and high,
And from Webster, Olney, Dabold, and old
Lindley Murray learned all 'twas deemed that child
Or man need ever know. And there are still
The meadows and the hills and running streams,
And in the early time of spring the birds
They come again; again the grasses grow,
Again the flowers bloom, but now they bloom
Above the playmates gone—forever gone.
O cherished memories that make us weep,
Yet still we love and cling to them always,
E'en when years hav silvered o'er our heads
With the gray drapery of departing day!
'Tis then this crowning magic power of thine
Becomes a solace sweet when we become
A child again. But dearer than all these Memories of hill and stream, and song of birds
And playmates gone, are the old fireside joys
Of home, the love of mother and the care
Of father, and the sweet affection of Sisters dear and brothers kind—aye, these
Are the dearest treasures in the casket of memories.
Ease from mind its memories, and all
The past would sleep in unremembered grave.
No ray of hope from out the years gone by
Would e'er hav thrown its light beyond the line
That lies between the two eternities;
And art and history and science too,
And all that givs to man a name, to life
A joy, would ne'er hav thrilled the human soul;
Darker than darkest night would be the pall
Resting upon, above, and over all.
'Tis memory then goes back through all the years
And treasures up the beauties of the past,
Gathering in her bright and golden urn
The melody of song—the precious gems
Of thought that shine like polished diamonds bright
Along the winding path the world has trod.
Thou art the cable strong whose welded lines
Do hold the sailing craft and floating wreck
All safe above the sweeping tide of time
That man may see the all of what has been;
That he may shape the now to good account,
So that out on the great ocean of time
To come no floating wreck shall there be seen,
For man should be one great grand brotherhood
Linked by common ties and common interests,
Learning wisdom from memorized pages
That time hath written on her glories
And also on her ruins. Well should he know
That on the still, calm seas all crafts are safe;
That 'tis out on the dark and surging waves
That wrecks are made. Then why not wisdom learn
And sail the ships of life on waters calm?

. . . . . .

And he who alms hath often asked, and often too
Hath felt the keen demands that gnawing hunger makes,
At last, unowned, in Potter's Field is laid to rest.
No slab doth mark the spot, and there no tears are shed
Save those that cloud and wild flower drop, and drop alike
On all the dead, yet sleeps as quiet and as sweet
As he who lies beneath a granit base on which
The chiseled marble stands, that speaks of birth, of death,
And to what church belonged, but always dumb to faults.
And this may e'er be well, for who that livs would wish
Their faults to liv when they hav gone adown the vale
To final home, where all the countless dead hav gone
And all who liv must go? Oh, then, spread broad the robe
That covers faults, and only memorize the good,
Or write it on historic page, that they who come
To take our place need never blush because we were!
Then liv to highest light, express the noblest thoughts,
And only in this light, and this expression too,
Move out and on and through the world, that world at large
May better be because that you hav lived thereon;
Make life and deed, and not belief or creed, to write for you a name.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.
REPLIES TO THE
"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."
By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CHRISTIANITY
FROM A
Scientific and Historical Standpoint.
BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusively that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

"WILSONIA"

TRIUMPHANT.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS are the marvel of the world.
They are dumbfounding the scientists and physicians, and making glad the hearts of the people.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE PHYSICIANS, CHEMISTS, AND ELECTRICIANS OF BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK

GENTLEMEN: A little over a year ago I arrived in the city of Brooklyn from Europe, and at 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, commenced the sale of my patented Magnetic clothing, advertised and known as the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I addressed a circular letter to a large number of medical men in Brooklyn, in which I fully described the nature of my invention, at the same time pointing out to them the rationale of my method of cure. A few members of the profession accepted my offer, and visited me for the purpose of having my invention fully explained to them. Of those who came there was not one but readily accepted my theory of disease, and recognized the possibilities of cure by my method, but a number of those written to so forgot themselves and their character of gentlemen as to openly insult me by the return of my letters and in other ways openly expressed their bitterness of thought by designating me a CHARLATAN and a fraud. This line of conduct impelled me to open warfare against the now universal system of DRUG TREATMENT; but knowing as I do that there are many noble men in the profession who are ever ready to examin and accept that which is really beneficial and efficacious, no matter from what source it may come. With this fact before me, I am constrained to call upon the faculty of Brooklyn and New York, and respectfully invite them to visit my Manufactory and Consulting Rooms, when I will explain fully everything connected with my method of treatment. I will giv them the names and addresses in Brooklyn and New York of hundreds of its best citizens, who hav under my system recovered from every form of malady known to Nosologists, and this without a single dose of medicin. I am, moreover, prepared to take a patient from every physician in Brooklyn that he has given over as an incurable case, and place upon such patients to the number of FIVE HUNDRED, a suit of my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, free of charge, and will undertake to cure ninety per cent of all those handed over to me, within twelve months from the time of putting on my GARMENTS, my only condition being that PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT bind themselvs not to giv or use medicin of any kind. I will sign bonds for five thousand dollars, to be given to any institution named, should I in the twelve months fail to cure ninety per cent of all their incurables under their several systems. I will also at once hand over $5,000 worth of my appliances to any hospital, free of charge, to be placed upon the sick poor in such institution, bonds to be given in this case also, that medicin will not be given in any way.
This is a standing offer for twelve months from date.
The following physicians may be referred to as having witnessed the effects of my GARMENTS:

Prof. CARMICHAEL,	Dr. ELTINGE,
FORDES BARKER,	Dr. THAYER,
Dr. DEMEREST,	Dr. TINKER,
Dr. CLARK,	Dr. TRUE.

The following gentlemen can also be referred to: Commissioner Garrison, J. B. Hoyt, Spruce street; Col. Bayard Clark, Judge Levi Parsons, E. Sinclair Clark, Lafayette avenue; J. W. Littlefield, artist; Mr. Frazer, corner of Reid avenue and Broadway. These, with thousands of others, hav worn my garments. Therefore, gentlemen, in conclusion I most respectfully submit that you owe a duty to yourselvs and the public to inquire into the nature of the invention thus presented to you. But knowing, as I do, that all new remedies for the cure of disease should be well attested scientifically by practicing physicians before being generally prescribed, I herewith offer you every facility for testing the same, and would respectfully call your attention to a portion of Professor Parson's lecture, published in Baltimore this week. You will therein see the necessity for your inquiry as to the position that magnetism is destined to take among the REMEDIAL AGENCIES now prescribed through your colleges. Hoping that you will seriously and in a fair spirit inquire into the nature of my invention, I remain,
Very respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

READ THE FOLLOWING PORTION OF A LECTURE. BY PROFESSOR PARSONS, AND SAY HOW MUCH LONGER CAN THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN RESIST THE INQUIRY WHICH THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM DEMANDS.

MORE LIGHT.

THE HARMONY OF THE SPHERES.

DISCOVERY OF THE UNIVERSAL PREVALENCE

OF A PRINCIPLE THAT GRANDLY MANIFESTS THE WISDOM AND GOODNESS

OF ALMIGHTY GOD.

Professor W. H. Parsons, a talented and modest gentleman, who is now a resident of our city, has made a discovery that is likely to be regarded with the deepest interest by men of science everywhere, since it not only explains much heretofore mysterious in astronomical science, but is calculated to impress all minds with more profound admiration for the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God.
This discovery is that the sublime principle of MAGNETIC REPULSION is coextensiv with MAGNETIC ATTRACTION throughout our universe. This magnetic repulsion has equal potency with Newton's law of the ATTRACTION OF GRAVITATION in regulating the movements of all celestial bodies and maintaining harmony among them all. This principle was first developed in the course of manifestations and experiments of Professor Parsons, who is an electro-therapeutist, or medical electrician, while making researches into the relations of electro-magnetism to animal life, disease, and death.
Without attempting to trace how far previous advances of science had prepared the way for the grand discovery by Professor Parsons to which we desire to call attention, we may introduce our readers by glancing at the great facts in magnetic philosophy.
Magnetism and electricity—the one the manifestation of the other, with different forms of motion; the one vibratory, as light and heat; the other spiral, as demonstrated by the induction balance, each convolution possessed with magnetic poles—are neither imponderable fluids nor atomic streams, but forces known only from results, the direction of the individual force in each molecule of all magnets, whether in the blood or the heavens, being the opposit of the force in its vicinity, giving rise to a magnetic force, says Maxwell, of extreme complexity, but which, by its repellant as well as its attractiv power, works order out of apparent and really original chaos, and under law established at creation's dawn is the principle of all motion and all life in every kingdom of nature, either in the heavens above or the earth beneath.
Perfect polarization, whereby like poles repel and unlike attract and neutralize each other, whether in the celestial system, including our own planet, or the circulatory system of the blood and nerves, of what is as fearfully, wonderfully, and as curiously made—the divine organism of man—is the source and law [it is not attraction of gravitation, affirmed by Newton, or the undefined centripetal and centrifugal forces of scientists], but the omnipotent and omnipresent governing force which maintains all motion, all life, all health, and all harmony in the cosmogony of the universe.
The law (attraction and repulsion) in each molecular current, or rings of electricity, in either the circular corpuscles which float in arterial or venous blood, or the circular orbs which float in the firmament of the heavens, is the now manifest and realized omnipresent and omnipotent attribute of nature and nature's god by which worlds and all celestial bodies, including comets, are sustained in space without possibility of collision, and all motion, whether orbital or axital, has become the harmony of the spheres.
Its disturbance in the one is the source of all commotion, celestial (as solar magnetic storms) or terrestrial, inward, as in the magnetic shocks of the earthquake, or outward, in electric storms by land or sea. Its interruption in the animal organism whereby the ultimate electric molecules of the blood, tissues, nerves, and muscles, each with a positiv and negativ pole (recently discovered and announced to exist by Shettle Scoutellon, of Paris, and Dubois Reymond), become non-electric or demagnetized, in which non-electric state, says Reymond, these molecules are turned toward each other with like poles so that two become one, possessed of one positive zone and two negativ poles, and when in the electrotonic state unequal or unlike poles are turned toward each other. This non-electric or demagnetized state of the iron molecules of the blood, or the electric molecules of the nerves and muscles is, therefore, the source of all disorder and all diseases in the human cosmos.
I may be, and we believe it is, the law that the celestial strangers known as comets are magnetic regulators designed to resupply the wasted magnetic forces of the spheres they traverse in space, creating apparent temporary disturbance and increased activity in the magnetic forces of the sun, plainly visible in the solar spectrum, and due, says Lockyear, in a recent lecture before the Royal Astronomical Society, to the ejection of heated matter in the interior of the sun, the result of increased temperature and consequent breaking up of magnetic iron in the sun into simpler constituents.
Whatever weight is due to this theory of magnetic restoration of exhausted planets—illustrated in the increased temperature of the sun thus excited by the positiv forces of its late and still freshly announced celestial visitors—it has been demonstrated that the electro magnetic or nervo electric vital forces of the human organism can be uniformly replenished and resupplied and reinvigorated and revitalized from the very verge of dissolution and partial demagnetization of the ultimate electric molecules of blood and nerve by the truthful application of the maxim of the great German Esculapius, that like cures like, with the universal law of proper polarization, celestial and terrestrial, revealed and understood, man may and will control its forces; unlock the arcana of nature in all her kingdoms; stand within the veil face to face with the magnetic source of universal life and motion; and the preventiv of decay and premature death approach to comprehend with a spirit of exultation and awe the now revealed, yet still invisible, power, which, when darkness was upon the face of the deep and chaos reigned, moved upon the face of the waters, uttered the supreme fiat, and solar magnetism burst upon a primeval world, bathed it in light, and then as now, invested it with life and clad it in beauty.

THE "WILSONIA."

The "Wilsonia" will cure every form of disease that is curable without medicin of any kind, change of diet or occupation. Magnetism is all that is needed when any portion of the human organism is deranged. It is by the forces of magnetism that the stars are kept in their orbits, and the heavenly bodies bear witness to God's omniscience in his first grand conception of so simple a method as the polarization of ultimate atoms, whereby the repellant and attractiv forces thus inhering keep constant and in order all vegetable, animal, and mineral life, there being even in minerals ample evidence of life forces, although to our senses they may appear dead.
The forces of cohesion in mineral and aeriform bodies are but modifications of the same magnetic law, and the disintegration and breaking up of the atoms forming the mass is only another form of death; actual death cannot be; all is changed; nothing ever dies; its form is alone altered. Disease, therefore, is nothing more than an alteration of polarities, whereby the organism is disarranged. If, therefore, we can by any means keep the peculiar polarities of our organic structure in perfect unison, then disease cannot be; and knowing as we do that the blood is the regulator of our being by virtue of its circulation, such circulation being animated by electric nerve finids keeping in constant magnetic condition the atoms of iron in the blood; but when nature be impaired or exhausted, then any perfect artificial magnetization will restore the diseased organism, no matter what name may hav been given to the malady.

THE "WILSONIA"

Magnetic Garments are nature's true remedy for every ill, and there is not in the world such testimony as can be found here, in Brooklyn and New York, as to the wonderful yet simple treatment of disease.

The "WILSONIA" will cure any of the following forms of disease:

Paralysis,
Inflammatory Rheumatism,
Anchylasis,
Asthma,
Bronchitis,
Inflammation of the Lungs
Heart Disease,
Albuminous Urine,
Locomotor Ataxia,
Gout,
Varicose Veins,
Catarrh,
Pneumonia,
Bleeding at the Lungs,
Congestion of the Kidneys,
Spinal Disease.

Evidence of this we can giv from the experience of over THIRTY THOUSAND persons.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

"Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

"The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

A GOD who loves sacrifice cannot be just, sacrifice being a breach of justice.—Charles Laperche.

THE God and Bible-believer has taken a Herculean task—that of making fact, reason, truth, and consistency out of fable, miracle, falsehood, and inconsistency. Why not drop gods, ghosts, and myths, and help us to make good men and women out of the materials now on hand? Leave the future to take care of itself and improve the now. Let us make the earth blossom as the rose, and cultivate all the graces, the virtues, and the moralities. Let us liv for love and read the great volume of nature. Build up the arts and the sciences. Seek out the laws of heredity. Pay due heed to parental influences, and build here on earth a race who shall as far surpass the old Bible gods, ghosts, and angels as our present enlightened civilized inhabitants surpass the wild savages of the African interior.—Elmina D. Slenker.

WE may dwell as much as we will upon the charm of a faith into which intellectual speculation never enters; but we shall never know the full power of spiritual convictions until they are also intellectual beliefs. To believe with the mind without the heart may be barren; but to believe with the heart without the mind is fruitful in delusions and nourishes an unreal life. If religion is ever to become the rule of the life that now is, as well as of the life that is to come, it must become as intellectual as it is affectional, not ingenious, esthetic, academic—this is not intellectual—but intellectual in the sense of being penetrated with, resting upon, thought.—Rev. H. W. Bellews.

"PAINT me as I am," said Oliver Cromwell while sitting to young Laly; "If you leave out the scars and wrinkles I will not pay you a shilling." Even in such a trifle the great Protector showed his good sense and his magnanimity. He did not wish all that was characteristic in his countenance to be lost in the vain attempt to giv him the regular features and smooth, blooming cheeks of the curl-pated minions of James I. He was content that his face should go forth marked with all the blemishes which had been put on it by time, by war, by sleepless nights, by anxiety, perhaps by remorse, but with valor, policy, authority, and public care written in all its princely lines. If men truly great knew their own interest, it is thus that they would wish their minds to be portrayed.—Macaulay.

SOFT you; a word or two before you go.
I hav done the state some service, and they know 't.
No more of that. I pray you in your letters,
When you shall these unlucky deeds relate,
Speak of me as I am, nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice. —Shakspere.

FOWK canna come richt 'xcept by havin' room to gang wrang.—George Macdonald.

GOD, we are told, desires the happiness of all men, and has the power to make all men happy. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of the human family are miserable, and none are entirely happy. His watchful eye observes everything, even the falling of a sparrow (Matt. x, 29-31, and Luke xii, 6 and 7), and "his tender mercies are all over his works" (Psalm cxlv, 9); yet war, famin, and "the pestilence that walked in darkness" (Psalm lxxxxi, 6) slew every year immense multitudes, including the gentle, the noble, and the good. Patriots and philanthropists languish and die in loathsome dungeons, martyrs expire amid the flames, the poor are robbed, vice glistens in the palace, slaves wither under the cruel lash of their masters, and whole nations are impoverished by tyrants and priests, yet this God—whose pretended oracles pledge his aid and assistance whenever needed and asked in faith- never interposes to help poor suffering humanity.—Underwood.

AT first David took refuge with the Philistines and fought against his own countrymen. Next he turned brigand, and was joined by all the criminals and outlaws of the land. The cave of Axtullam was his lair, whence he sallied forth to levy blackmail on the rich farmers and graziers of the neighborhood, cutting their throats when they refused to pay. At the same time David was a very religious man, and never went on a plundering expedition without consulting a little image, which revealed to him the orders and wishes of Jehovah, just as the Bedouins always pray to Allah before they commit a crime, and thank him for his assistance when it has been successfully performed.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

TO learn the art of contentment is only to learn what happiness actually consists in. Sensual pleasures add little to its substance. Ease—if by that be meant exemption from labor—contributes nothing. One, however, constant spring of satisfaction and almost infallible support of cheerfulness and spirits is the exercise of the domestic affections; the presence of objects of tenderness and endearment in our families, our kindred, our friends. Nor hav the poor anything to complain of here? Are they not surrounded by their relations as generally as others? The poor man has his wife and children about him, and what has the rich man? He has the same enjoyment of their society; the same solicitude for their welfare; the same pleasure in their good qualities, improvement, and success. Their connection with him is as strict and intimate, their attachment as strong, their gratiude as warm.—Paley's Reasons for Contentment.

THE connection between error and misery, between truth and happiness, becomes gradually more apparent as our inquiries proceed and produces at last a complete conviction that, even in those cases when we are unable to trace it, the connection exists. He who feels this as he ought will consider a steadfast adherence to the truth as an expression of benevolence to man and of confidence in the righteous administration of the universe, and will suspect the purity of those motivs which would lead him to advance the good of his species or the glory of his maker by deceit and hypocrisy.—Dugald Stewart.

Odds and Ends.

JOSH BILLINGS'S PRAYER—NEW REVISION.

From tu many friends, and from things with luce ends, deliver us!

From a wife who don't luv us, and children who don't look like us, deliver us!

From wealth without charity, from pride without sense, from pedigrees worn out, and from all rich relations deliver us!

From snaix in the grass, from nails in our butes, from torch-light processions, and from nu rum deliver us!

From pack-peddlers, from young folks in luv, from old aunts without money, and kolery morbis deliver us!

From newspaper sells, and pills that ain't fisic, from females who faint, and men who flatter, deliver us.

From virtue without fragrance, from butter that smells, from nigger camp-meeting, and from cats that are kourting, deliver us!

From other folk's secrets, and from our own and women committees, deliver us!

From folks who won't laugh, and from them who giggle; from tite butes, easy virtue, and mutton deliver us!

THE RAM AT CHURCH.

Mollie had a little ram, fleece black as rubber shoe, and everywhere that Mollie went, he emigrated too.

He went with her to church one day; the old folks hi-la-rious grew, to see him walk demurely into Deacon Al-len's pew!

The wor-thy deacon quickly let his angry passions rise, and gave it an unchristian kick between the sad brown eyes.

This landed rammy in the aisle; the deacon followed fast, and raised his foot again, but ah! the first kick was his last.

For Mr. Sheep walked back about a rod, 'tis said, and ere the deacon could retreat it stood him on his head!

The congregation then arose and went for that ere sheep, but several well-directed butts just piled them in a heap.

Then rushed they straightway for the door, with curses long and loud, while rammy struck the hindmost man and shot him through the crowd.

The minister had often heard that kindness would subdue the fiercest beast, so, "Ah!" he says, "I'll try that game on you."

And so he kindly, gently called, "Come, rammy, rammy, ram; to see the folks abuse you so I grieve and sorry am!"

With kind and gentle words he came from that tall pulpit down, saying, "Rammy, rammy, ram, rammy, rammy, rammy, best sheepy in the town."

Then rammy looked meek, and on he came, with "Rammy, rammy, ram; ram, rammy, rammy, rammy, ram; the nicey, pretty ram."

The ram quick dropped its bumble air, and rose from off his feet; and when the parson lit he lay beneath the hindmost seat.

As he shot out the open door, and closed it with a slam, he named a California town—I think 'twas "Yuba Dam!"—Modern Argo.

THE TRUE TALE OF WILLIAM TELL.

William Tell ran a hay ranch near Bergelen about five hundred and eighty years ago. Tell had lived in the mountains all his life, and shot chamois and chipmunks with a cross-gun till he was a bad man to stir up. At that time Switzerland was run principally by a lot of carpet-baggers from Austria, and Tell got down on them about the year 1307.

It seems that Tell wanted the government contract to furnish hay at forty-five dollars a ton for the year 1306, and Gessler, who was controling the patronage of Switzerland, let the contract to an Austrian who had a big lot of condemned hay further up the gulch.

One day Gessler put his plug hat on a telegraph pole, and issued order 236, regular series, to the effect that every snoozer passing down the toll-road should bow to it. Gessler happened to be in behind the brush when Tell went by, and he noticed that Bill said "Shoot the hat," and didn't salute it; so he told his men to gather Mr. Tell in, and put him in the refrigerator. Gessler told him that if he would shoot a crab-apple from the head of his only son at two hundred yards with a cross gun he would giv him his liberty. Tell consented, and knocked the apple higher than Gilroy's kite.

Old Gessler, however, noticed another arrow sticking in William's girdle, and he asked what kind of a flowery break that was. Tell told him that if he had killed the kid instead of busting the apple, he intended to drill a hole through the stomach of Mr. Gessler.

This made Gessler mad again, and he took Tell on a picnic up the river in irons. Tell jumped off when he got a good chance, and cut across a bend in the river, and when the picnic party came down he shot Gessler deader than a mackerel. This opened the ball for freedom, and weakened the Austrian government so much that in the following November they elected Tell to fill the long term, and a half-breed for the short term. After that Tell was recognized by the ruling power, and he could get most any contract he wanted to. He got the service on the stage line up into the Alps increased to a daily, and had the contracts in the name of his son Albert. The appropriation was increased $150,000 per year, and he had a good thing.

Tell lived many years after this, and was loved by the Swiss people because he had freed their land. Whenever he felt lonesome he would take his cross-gun and go out and kill a tyrant. He had tyrant and toast almost every day till Switzerland was free, and the peasants blessed him as their deliverer.

When Tell got to be an old man he would go out into the mountains and apostrophize them in these memorable words: "Ye crags and peaks, I am with you once again. I hold to you the hands I held to you on previous occasions to show you they are free. The tyrant's crust is busted, so to speak. His race is run, and he himself hath scooted up the flume. Sic semper McGinnis, terra firma, nux vomica Schweitzer kase, Timbuctoo erysipelas, epluribus unum, sciatica, multum in parvo, vox populi vox snockmeonthegob."—Boomerang.

ALL Saints' Protestant Episcopal church, San Francisco, went up in a blaze a few days ago. The rectory was also destroyed.

PETER COOPER, now over ninety years of age, is going to expend about $60,000 the present summer in improving the Cooper Union.

IN the vicinity of Marinpol are seven Jewish colonies, three of which were lately attacked by Russian peasants, who destroyed all their property.

A CREDITOR is by birth and nature a ritualist. He has a superstitious regard for set days and times—the days and times when certain notes become due.

MEN are so credulous that they believe any amount of evil told of a neighbor, and at the same time so incredulous that they can't possibly believe any good.

IF a man declares himself to be so thoroughly religious that he has not committed a sin for twenty years, you are safe in concluding that he does not regard lying as sinful.

THE latest news sent out from Pink Cottage, the Kentucky hospital of miracles, is that a woman's awfully curved spine straightened out while prayer was being made for her.

THREE Michigan girls made up a party and eloped with a young man. By going to three different ministers he married all of his companions, and then they went on a tripartite bridal tour.

A GIRL at Lynn, Iowa, went to a picnic with her lover instead of going to a prayer-meeting, as her father had ordered. The parent tied her to a post on her return, and gave her such a whipping that she died next day.

PROF. PICTET, the discoverer of the liquefaction of oxygen, has invented an improved steam vessel with which he expects to attain a speed of thirty-five miles an hour. A model vessel is built, and will shortly be tried on the lake of Geneva.

THE queen of Madagascar has issued a proclamation forbidding her subjects either to sell or drink rum. She says she cannot take a revenue from anything that debases or degrades her subjects, and yet this woman is not a Christian.

THE Rev. Father Grogan attempted to drive a land league out of his parish school-house, in Chicago, where they were holding a meeting, and characterized them as "scoundrels and vagabonds." They retorted that he was drunk, and threw him into the street.

THE Two Religion Magazine is the name of the new religious journal published in Japan to warn the Japs against the influence of Christianity. Buddhism and Shintoism hav formed an offensiv and defensiv alliance against Christianity, and this is one of the results of it.

MADRAS, the so-called benighted presidency of India, is the first to recognize the claims of women to important offices. The Gazette announces the appointment of a lady, Miss Pogson, to be meteorological reporter to the government of that presidency. Miss Pogson has for some years discharged with great ability the duties of assistant government astronomer.

AMONG the emigrants passing west over the Pennsylvania Railroad one day last week was a German family, consisting of the grandfather, grandmother, and their nine children, six sons and three daughters, all of whom are married, with their families, on board the same train. There were forty grandchildren and eleven great-grandchildren, the entire relationship consisting of ninety-five people. They will settle in northern Iowa, and will form a colony of their own. Among the men in the party were practical farmers, weavers, shoemakers, and butchers.

IN addition to the $100 which Thomas Harrison, the popular revivalist, receives for a week's services at a camp-meeting, he makes a profit from the sale of his photographs, hymn books, and biography. The managers of the camp at Acton, Ind., say they were well pleased with these terms, and voluntarily provided him with a tent furnished in the most luxuriant manner.

THE hatred between Roman Catholics and Orangemen has been intensified in Ontario by Vincent F. De Longe, an apostate priest, who declares that he was subjected to torture for his heresy in a monastery at Sandwich. He tells a more wonderful story, however, of a Father Fitzpatrick's tongue being cut off in a Montreal monastery, because he spoke against the Pope. De Longe solemnly declares that he saw the mutilation, and the Orangemen believe him. On the other hand, he is said to hav long been insane, and those who hav him in charge admit that his mind is now unsettled.

A GERMAN philosopher has been experimenting as to the influences of intellectual labor upon the circulation of the blood. His observations show that the heart beats are increased two or three pulsations per second. The greater the labor and the closer the attention, the greater the number of pulsations. Thus this philosopher discovered that the study of geometry, to which he had never given much attention, made his heart beat more rapidly than that of philosophy, with which he was already familiar. Concerning the effect of arduous love-making upon the heart beats he does not appear to hav recorded any observations.

The plan of charging a regular admission fee has not proved altogether successful at a negro camp-meeting near Marion, Ohio. Bro. Hart had just made a fervent prayer, and was laboring zealously among the mourners, when the six members of the Finance Committee reminded him that he had climbed over the fence instead of entering by the gate. They demanded ten cents for himself and ten more for his wife, but he refused to pay, and they dragged him off the grounds. But he did not long stay expelled. He and his wife armed themselvs with clubs, knocked the ticket taker away from the gate, scattered the opposing committee of six financiers, thrashed the presiding minister himself, and resumed their work among the penitents.

"A MINISTER told me yesterday," said Mr Moody, as he began his talk on the Bible last Sunday night, "that what we want is conviction. But how can conviction be brought about without a firm belief in the Bible—in its entirety? When a man believes fully, and his daily walk is correct, he's a power; why, he'd convert a whole heathen nation. If the word of God is true in one part it's true in every part—in the whole. It's a great fashion here in this country for people to talk about the 'supernatural' in the Bible—in religion. You people here from Great Britain don't often hear this word. People nowadays cut and slash at the Bible till it's all gone. Some don't want anything to do with the Old Testament; the New is all right, but, oh, dear, the Old is gone by. But Jesus and his apostles had no other scriptures; then think of the hundreds of references in the New to the Old. For instance, Matthew has one hundred, and in Revelations there are two hundred and forty-five. Some want everything supernatural taken out of the Bible." Mr. Moody went on to cite the supernatural events recorded in the New and Old Testaments, saying, among other things, "Now, there's Jonah and the whale. 'Pooh!' says the scientific man, 'a whale's mouth isn't big enough to swallow a man, anyway.' But couldn't God make a whale big enough to swallow a man? Why, he could make a man big enough to swallow a whale." Upon considerable laughter in the audience at this, Mr. Moody emphasized the assertion. "Yes, I havn't the least doubt he could—not the least."—Springfield Republican.

THERE are about ten thousand regular summer residents at Ocean Grove. One of the most popular preachers said a few days ago that he had good reason to believe about two-thirds of these to be backsliders. If these gentlemen are correct, the evangelical work accomplished at this famous resort does not seem to be attended with as salutary results as has generally been supposed. Many of the preachers who hav had much to do with the Ocean Grove meetings are disturbed about the great growth of worldliness among some of those who by this time should hav become the most highly spiritualized. If a dozen years of camp-meeting fervor can make no better exhibit than the backsliding of some six or seven thousand people who are in the habitual enjoyment of the means of grace which hav been so highly extolled, the indication is that some other plan of operations may hav to be substituted for those which hav drawn such crowds of pilgrims to this Methodist Mecca.

A FIGHT between Dr Hargett and the Rev. Mr. Mackey is enlivening Youngstown, Ohio. The doctor is a middled-aged medical practitioner of good standing; the clergyman is a young Methodist pastor. Both are bachelors, and formerly they were intimate friends. The trouble began when Hargett sent Mackey a bill for doctoring. Mackey refused to pay, and Hargett advertised the debt for sale. Then Mackey preached a sermon on Hargett, violently assailing his character, and charging him with dyeing his hair, desiring a young wife, and going to Cincinnati on sprees. Hargett retaliated by publishing an accusation that Mackey was a hypocrit; that he was a visitor at sinful resorts in disguise, and that he habitually kissed those women in his congregation who would let him. The minister denies that he is a skeptic in any particular, and admits that he has visited the wicked places as charged, but only for the purpose of getting information for sermons against them. As for the kissing, he says that it has been confined to unmarried women, whom he has a perfect right to kiss, if it is mutually agreeable.

Gov. O. M. ROBERTS of Texas, in conversation with a representativ of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, recently gave his reasons in detail for not joining with Gov. Foster in the Thanksgiving proclamation for the President's recovery. He said: "This union of church and state is all wrong. It has taken a larger and more arduous battle to divide the church from the state than it did to achieve our national independence. You know how it was in England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Men of one faith fought for the right to uphold it as against another. When they could not achieve it in the old country they came to the new. You had the Congregationalists in Massachus tts, the Quakers in Pennsylvania, the Lutherans in New York, the Baptists in Maryland, the Huguenots in the Carolinas. Each class had its faith, and that faith swayed the state, especially, as the books tell us, in New England. Only church members voted, and in all essential matters the conventicle was supreme. But toward the middle of the eighteenth century came along the Freethinking English artisan and Scotch Presbyterian, who fled from the defeat of Cullodin and Preston Pans. These were a thrifty, cultivated, logical class, and they gradually disseminated the leaven whose creation is the present outward separation of church and state. I say outward because, as you well know, it is only in name. The religious principle of New England and Ohio makes their politics. We hav seen plenty of that in the war, and it is this unconscious, subtle union of the church and state in the public mind that shows to the front in days of thanksgiving and fasts of solemn prayer. It is all right to fast and pray. I don't object, but I do not see the necessity for the governor of a state directing its religious concerns, and hence I thought it was about time to inaugurate the contrary policy."

News of the Week.

NAVIGATION on the Ohio river is virtually closed on account of low water.

SEVERAL of the new ocean steamers are being fitted up with the electric light.

A CLERGYMAN had a leg taken off by a train at Carbondale, Pa., on Saturday last.

JOHN TOBIN, of Chicago, has been sentenced to imprisonment for life for having kicked his daughter to death.

A MAN in Delafield, Wis., poisoned his whole family a few days ago. His wife and two children hav died.

ILLINOIS is afflicted by a serious drouth. Wells and streams are dry, pastures burned, and nearly all the late corn ruined.

GEN. HURLBUT, our new minister to Peru, has presented his credentials to the provisional government of that country.

INDIANS attacked the town of Eureka, New Mexico, a few days ago, and massacred all the citizens, said to be about seventy.

AN engagement between the French troops in Tunis and 12,000 Arabs recently took place. The loss on both sides was small.

SPECIAL prayers for the President were offered up by the devout in most of the churches of this country and England on Sunday last.

THE President is still alive, but hopes for his recovery are almost given up. Blood-poisoning is slowly but surely eating his life away.

THE editor of a paper in Quincy, Ill., was burned in effigy, a few nights ago, for saying that Guiteau was just as honorable as Garfield.

ONE man was killed and several hundred thousand dollars' worth of freight destroyed by a smash-up on the Erie Railroad near Olean, on the 29th.

OWING to threats made in various parts of the country to lynch Guiteau in the event of the President's death, the force at the jail has been strengthened.

THE steamer State of New York, from Hartford, Conn., for this city, struck on a rock in the Connecticut river, and went down almost immediately. Only one life was lost.

TEN farm hands, near Kaufman, Texas, were poisoned recently by eating peaches in which arsenic had been put by some unknown person. It is thought that all of them will die.

THE largest grain elevator in the world has just been completed in Brooklyn, N. Y. It is 100 by 1,200 feet, and can take grain from vessels at the rate of 8,000 bushels per hour.

BY a collision on the Grand Trunk Railway at Lancaster, Ont., on Sunday, two men were killed and others injured. The engins were smashed to pieces and the cars piled in a heap.

DURING a hurricane at Port Royal, S. C., on last Saturday night, a ferry house was swept into the river, drowning several persons. The number lost is variously estimated at from twenty to forty.

A FURIOUS hurricane raged in Charleston, S. C., on Saturday and Saturday night last. Several lives were lost. The sea threw spray forty feet high over the sea-wall at the city front.

THREE men were killed and five others seriously injured by the breaking of a hoisting apparatus on an electric light pole in Union Square, this city, a few days ago. The pole is 150 feet high, and is to support eight large lights.

CHAPTER XIII.

"And therein even lies its paradise!" sighed I when I stood in my room, and thought of Clementine.

I took the withered wreath down and hung it on the harp. It had been thus far to me the sacred pledge of Clementine's favor. Had she not herself thrown it upon my breast, that contains the loving heart? Did she not then seem to wish to crown this with her own hand? Could it hav been only childish playfulness? Ah! could it hav been the same to her if it had been a crown of thorns, or a wreath of blossoms, which she drew around the heart?

She was at the window. I lifted up the wreath and held it against my lips. She seemed to recognize it. She hid a smile, leaned out of the window, looked down into the street and no more over to me.

This answer plunged me into unspeakable inquietude. It seemed to me as if she were ashamed of the recollection of having once given me that present. Now, all at once, it was clear to me, what I asked, what I hoped. I longed for the impossible. Never had I fancied to myself Clementine as wife. I only loved her and wished to be loved by her. But, wife? I, the poor son of a peasant that had died in debt—I, who still had to battle with want, and only saw before me an uncertain fate in the future—I was asking Montpellier's richest heiress.

My proud courage sank. I loved Clementine, but pardoned her if she could not return my love. I became aware that I could not change the conditions of human society, and was in reality too proud to make my outer fortune through the hand of a woman.

More zealously thereafter I pursued my studies. I would through my own strength make my way to Clementine's hights. Nights I watched through among my books. I wanted to hear the unrestrained opinion of experts about my talents, and caused to appear, anonymously, a work on the jurisprudence of the older nations, and at the same time a collection of poems, of which a considerable part was dictated into my mind and pen by my sacred love.

The public appearance of my works was of unexpected success. The loud applause raised my self-reliance. Curiosity soon made known the name of the author, and I reaped everywhere caresses. The success of my first book lit again the extinguished torch of hope, under the light of which, although in the vanishing distance, I beheld Clementine as my own.

She herself rewarded me in the most beautiful manner. When my name had already become more known, she once in her window read my poems. Even without knowing the name of the author could she in the easiest manner guess it, from hundreds of expressions which she alone understood. She looked over, smiled, and pressed the book to her bosom, as if she wanted to make me understand, "I love it, and what thou sayest therein hast thou spoken to this heart; and it feels it, and is full of gratitude."

I took once more the withered wreath, which I so often had made the subject of my song. She smiled and bowed, and looked over no more.

CHAPTER XIV.

But nobody was more charmed through the applause I earned than my friend Bertollon. He more and more closely and confidingly joined himself to me. We looked upon each other as brothers. He gave himself up to me entirely, and proved in a thousand ways that he had a heart even for others. He permitted no day to escape without a good deed. I myself soon learned only through accident this—this beautiful act of his.

"Oh, Bertollon!" I cried once, while pressing him with violence to myself, "what a man art thou! Why must I pity thee in the same degree that I admire thee!"

"Thou doest in both too much, for I do not deserve the one nor the other," answered he, with a gentle smile.

"No, Bertollon, that is lamentable that thou art good and virtuous without wishing to be. Thou callest virtue enthusiasm and monotonousness of ideas, and yet unceasingly thou fulfillest its commands."

"Well, Alamontada, then be contented with that. Why dost thou tire thyself out continually on my conversion? When thou growest older, I see thyself follow my footsteps. For the present be at least tolerant. The same child has, perhaps, only a double name."

"I doubt. Couldst thou, Bertollon, plunge thyself voluntarily into misery in order to sustain the just cause?"

"But what dost thou call the just cause? Thy ideas are not clear."

"If thou couldst save Montpellier from destruction through self-sacrifice, wouldst thou be able to suffer for that life-long poverty, or even death?"

"Mr. Colas, thou art enthusiastic again. Only enthusiasts can demand and bring such sacrifices. And it is good in this world that there are such people. But do once come to thoughtfulness. It hurts me that thou continually nurseth wrath. In this manner thou wilt never become fortunate. Run through the whole world and collect the fools together that will go for thy theories into death, thou wilt find among hundreds of millions not a single man. Everything is only under certain circumstances true, good, useful, just, beautiful. The ideas of mankind are everywhere different. How many hav meant to save the world with their death? They died for their power of imagination, and not for the world, and became afterwards ridiculed as fools."

"I could hate thee, Bertollon, for these words."

"Then thou wouldst, according to thy own theories, be not altogether too virtuous."

"If thou couldst increase thy riches thereby that thou wouldst push me into misery, wouldst thou push me into misery?"

"For such a question I could hate thee, Colas."

"And yet I was able to ask it. Thou aimest always, as thou sayest, only after that which thou callest useful. Thou weighest always, as thou sayest, the deed by the goodness of the success."

"Dear Colas, I see it already thou wilt become a poor lawyer and gather few treasures if thou wilt defend only that cause which is after thy opinion just and never the unjust, if thou couldst in that way gain a profit."

"I swear to thee, Bertollon, I would despise myself as long as I lived if I should once move my lips to accuse innocence or protect vice."

"And yet, thou good-hearted little fool, thou wilt hav to do it more than once, because thou dost not always find man's guilt or innocence inscribed on his forehead. Go! thou wilt be the world's fool if thou canst not walk the same way with it."

So we often quarreled with each other. I sometimes did not know how to take him. I could hav feared him if he had not always told me his terrible opinions in so playful a manner as if he himself did not believe them. He only loved to get me into an excitement, and when he had succeeded he laughed heartily. But his deeds contradicted his words.

CHAPTER XV.

Madame Bertollon, on the other hand, exhibited daily more the beautiful spirit that dwelt within her. She burned with virtue, which she practiced with religious zeal.

I became her table-companion. Alone with her I lived through the long winter evenings. She learned from me to play the harp. Soon I could accompany her charming singing with my lute. She sang my songs, and with deep feeling. She was enchanting. Her beauty could hav been dangerous to me if my heart had not been fixed on Clementine.

Bertollon smiled when I spoke to him of her with enthusiasm. When I reproaced him, that he could leave such an amiable being so completely to herself, he answered: "Our taste is different. Leave to every one his own. Wouldst thou, dear despot, ask that all heads and all hearts should be molded after the model of thy own? I know, my wife does not lose anything by my absence. She, therefore, is not unhappy that I treat her so, as it is customary in the married life of the educated classes. She knew this beforehand. Dost thou feel well in her society, I am glad of it, and I like it, if she finds entertainment in thy society. Thou seest, virtuous Colas, I also am capable of great sacrifice. For I leave thee to her often when I would most longingly desire to hav thee with me."

I had finished my studies and had received the degree of doctor of laws and a license to appear as an attorney before the tribunals of the kingdom. My multiplied work in the mean time made my visits to Madame Bertollon less frequent. But the more gladly she received me there every time; the more vividly I felt how dear she was to me. We did not say to ourselvs, in words, how necessary we had become to each other, but each betrayed it to the other in mien and in heartiness of conduct.

Sometimes it seemed to me as if she was sadder than at other times, and then again she was more attentiv and devoted. Sometimes she seemed to treat me with strange coldness and reserve, and then again with sisterly tenderness to quiet me over my anxiety. This changeableness of behavior was strange to me, but in vain I attempted to discover the source thereof. Nevertheless it remained not hidden from me that she was no longer the always cheerful and even dispositioned one of former days. I often found her with eyes red from weeping. She sometimes spoke with odd enthusiasm of the happiness of the seclusion of convent life. Thereby she withdrew from her customary society more and more. A concealed melancholy gnawed at the bloom of her young life.

These observations made me also sad. I often vainly endeavored to cheer her up. The melancholy of her looks, the fading roses in her cheeks, her deep silence and her effort to hide from me the grief that sickened her heart, under artificial merriment, mixed with my friendship the mild warmth and tenderness of sympathy. How gladly would I hav put my life at stake to procure for her happier days.

Once, in the evening, as I accompanied her singing with my harp, a sudden gush of tears interrupted her voice. Startled, I leaned back the harp. She arose and wanted to flee into her cabinet, in order not to show her pain to me.

How touching are virtue, beauty, and innocence in the moment of silent suffering! I seized her hand and held her back.

"No," she cried, "leave me!"

"But so to leave you is impossible for me. Remain. May I not know your sorrow? Am I not your friend? Do you not yourself call me thus? And does this beautiful name not give me the right to inquire after your affliction, which you in vain try to conceal from me?"

"Leave me. I conjure you, leave me!" cried she, and would free herself from me with feeble strength.

"No. You are unhappy," said I.

"Alas, unhappy!" sighed she with unrestrained pain, and her beautiful face sank on my breast in order to hide her tears.

Involuntarily I clapsed my arms around the gentle sufferer. I, too, was overcome by melancholy sympathy. I stammered to her words of consolation, and begged her to quiet herself.

"Alas, unfortunate I am!" cried she with violence and sobbing. I dared not, with untimely words of consolation, avert the storm of her emotions. I allowed her to cry herself out, and led her back to the arm-chair, as I felt she grew weaker and trembled. Her head remained on my breast.

"You do not feel well?" said I timidly.

"I am getting better!" she answered. After a while she became more quiet. She looked up and saw my eyes wet. "Why do you cry, Alamontada?" she whispered.

"Can I remain untouched at seeing your grief?" answered I, while I stooped down to her. Silent, hand in hand and eye in eye, we sat there, lost in our feelings. A tear stole over her cheeks. I slowly bent toward her, and kissed it away, and drew the suffering one closer to my heart, insensible of what I did. My lips burned upon hers, and I felt my kiss softly returned. We remained embraced and our tears evaporated on our glowing cheeks. In our kisses flamed an intoxicating fire, and what we termed friendship had changed into love.

We separated. Ten times we separated, and just as often I sank upon her neck and forgot separation.

Staggering like a drunkard, I arrived in my room; harp, wreath, and window scared me.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

INTRODUCTION.*

The desire to dominate is one of the strongest passions in man. A theologian, a missionary, and a leader of a party can domineer as well as a prince. There are many sects in the world which hav almost sovereign power. The question is, to which sect shall I submit my soul? Shall I become a Christian merely because I happen to liv in London or Madrid? Shall I become a Mohammedan because I was born in Turkey? I am the only person able to think for myself. I must choose a religion for myself, and not allow others to choose one for me; for the choice of a religion is of the greatest import. One may worship God through Mohammed, and another one may worship him through the grand lama, and another through the pope, but happy is he who worships God through reason alone.

The stupid indolence which the majority of men bestow upon one of the most important objects of life seems to prove that man is no better than a mere animal, whom instinct leads to gratify only the whims of the present moment. We treat our mind as we treat our bodies. We surrender both to charlatans. The people in Spain die with a monk on one side and a quack on the other. In England it is but

*At the head of the first edition the following was printed: "We giv a new edition of this most eloquent, profound, and most powerful work that has ever been directed against fanaticism. We hav made it our duty to multiply the works which attack a voracious religion that devours the substance of mankind. This summary of the doctrins of Lord Bolingbroke is complete and is taken from his posthumous works, dedicated by him a few years before his death to Lord Cornsbury."

[Voltaire used the name of Lord Bolingbroke as a mask under which he could attack the theologians and escape persecution. The doctrins in this introduction, and in the following chapters, are, to all intents, the same as those of Lord Bolingbroke. Voltaire edits them and appends critical and sarcastic notes under an assumed name in order to avoid suspicion.—TRANSLATOR.]

a little better.* A vicar or a dissenter besieges us during our last moments.

Only a few men examin a question for themselvs. Generally party spirit and envy determin a man's opinions. One great man, as Samuel Clarke for instance, was a Christian only because he was an enemy of Collins. Whiston was a Christian only because he was an Arian. Grotius only wished to confound the Gomaristes. Bossuet defended popery against Claude, who in turn fought for Calvinism. In the first century Arians fought Athanasians. The emperor Julian and his party combated both Arians and Athanasians, and the rest of the world opposed Christianity. The Christians occupied themselvs with the Jews. Which is to be believed? It is necessary to examin and question for ourselvs; it is a duty which no man can call in question. A man who receives his religion without questioning is like the beasts of burden which we hitch to our wagons.

The great number of sects among the Christians is prima facie evidence that the whole system is full of errors. Some wise man has said, "If God had wished me to believe in his divinity, the belief in his divinity would be necessary to my species. If it had been necessary it would hav been given to all alike, just as he has given to all two eyes and one mouth. Such a belief would uniformly obtain since all necessary properties are uniform. The principle of reason is common to all civilized nations. Every people acknowledge the existence of a God. They flatter themselvs that this recognition implies a truth. But each community has a different religion. Can they conclude, then, because it is within the bounds of reason to worship a God, that their religion is the true one.

If any principle which the world universally accepts is true, then all things diametrically opposed to those principles are erroneous. This I hold to be wrong, and my opposition to this principle increases when I see that the whole aim of the leaders of the various sects is to dominate over others and to enrich themselvs. All religious leaders from the priests of Japan to the bishops of Rome are occupied mainly in elevating a pontiff to a throne founded upon the misery of the people and cemented with the people's blood.

Let the Japanese examin the way their priests hav subjugated them through the ages ; let the Tartars exercise their reason and find out whether their grand lama is immortal; let the Turks criticise their Alkoran, and let the Christians carefully examin their evangelists.

I hav carefully examined the evangelists, and therefore hav the right to speak the truth about them. Pascal in one of his letters says, "Let those who oppose the Christian religion show the authority by which they judge," etc. I judge by these words that Pascal is a man who is biased by his party feelings. I can understand why a curé in France named Jean Meslier, who died a little while ago, asked pardon from God for inculcating Christianity. That disposition of a priest at the point of death, to speak his true thought, has more effect upon me than all the enthusiam of Pascal. I hav seen in Dorsetshire, in the diocese of Bristol, a clergyman renounce a living worth two hundred pounds sterling and avow to his congregation that his conscience would not permit him to teach the absurd doctrins of a Christian sect. But neither the testament of Jean Meslier nor the declaration of that worthy curate are decisiv proofs to me. The Jew Uriel Acosta publicly renounced the Old Testament in Amsterdam, but I shall believe no more in the Jew Acosta than in the curate Meslier. I can read the parts of a legal process with a critical attention without being led off by either one of the lawyers, and can examin the conclusions of both parties and decide according to my conscience. I am able to discuss the arguments of Wallaston and of Clarke, but I can only trust to my reason.

In the outset I refrain from touching upon the English church, since it is established by an act of Parliament. I regard it above all as the wisest and best regulated church in Europe. I am not of the opinion of the "Wigh Independent" that we should abolish all priestly offices and remit them into the hands of the heads of a family as in the times of the patriarchs. Our society is so constituted that it would not permit so radical a change. I think it necessary to maintain priests in order to hav them as preservers of our customs and to offer to God our prayers. We shall see whether they are jugglers, breeders, of discord and sanguinary persecutors.

Let us commence, then, to instruct ourselvs first.

*No. Lord Bolingbroke goes too far. A man livs and dies as he wishes with us ; only the foolish and the superstitious send for a priest. Even the priest mocks them. He knows well enough that he is no embassador from God to the dying.

In Catholic countries, in the extremity of life, it is thought necessary to perform frightful ceremonies and to engage in the ceremony of the extreme unction. The priest brings you, when sick, the popish God, surrounded by six candles. All the beggarly crowd of priests hav the right to enter your chamber. The more one indulges in this lugubrious pomp the more the vile clergy gain. They pronounce your sentence and then go to the tavern to drink up the proceeds of their earnings. The enfeebled spirits of sick men are so frightened at the fearfulness of the ceremony that they generally die.

Monsieur Falconnet, one of the doctors of the French king, having seen one of his patients die on account of witnessing the rite of the extreme unction, declared to the king that he would never again allow the sacrament to be administered to one of his patients. (1771.)

Religion as Stock in Trade.

There is a gospel tent on the corner of Second avenue and Twentieth street, in this city, where religion of the Moody and Sankey variety is dealt out, to all who want it, free. From the street the tent looks like a circus, but the resemblance ceases when you go inside. All the seats look in one direction, toward a raised platform, which is occupied by the general manager and exhorter, the Rev. Mr. Pratt, an organ, several ladies who hav long since ceased to be youthful, and two or three enthusiastic young male converts with nicely-combed hair. The tent is lighted by a gasoline lamp hoisted up the central mast. In the rear is a smaller tent for prayer-meetings. A paralytic policeman stands near by to preserve order in the immediate vicinity of the tent, though several stalwart ushers seem to be chiefly depended upon to disperse the small boys, who nightly congregate there and persist in remaining just outside the door and correcting the statements of the evangelists.

A young man from THE TRUTH SEEKER office strolled around there one evening last week. He walked meekly inside, and went slowly up the aisle looking for a seat at a modest distance from the platform. Suddenly his arm was seized by an usher who towered above him like a Goliath, and he was marched well forward and seated, gently but firmly, beside a stout Irishman with a green shade over his eye.

About this time the choir began to sing. The card which Mr. Pratt circulates states that this group of vocalists is led by the gentleman who has charge of the Chickering Hall choir. This is a mistake. They are not led by anybody. It was a go-as-you-please screeching match, and no two passed the finish together. Some cats that had been charging frantically about in the rear of the tent during the singing took up the song where the last member of the choir dropped it, and continued it until driven away by an usher.

Mr. Pratt then came forward and requested the audience to bow with him in prayer, when he proceeded to invoke the blessing of heaven in a voice well calculated te arrest the attention of the deity if he was anywhere on the east side of the city. After he had concluded his suggestions the services were continued by two men taking up a collection, while Mr. Pratt exhorted his hearers to liberality. "Remember," said he, "that God takes notice of every mean act. And if there are any here—which God forbid—who doubt this fact let them recollect that I myself hav a weather eye for those who like to come here every evening and listen to our singing, and pay nothing. I would like," he continued, with the earnestness of a man whose meals the next day depended upon the result of that collection, "to raise two cents apiece from every one in this tent. I hav never done it at any meeting yet, but I hav faith enough in the Lord Jesus Christ to believe that that average can be reached." The young man from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, being a printer and therefore opulent, contributed five cents.

Then Mr. Pratt introduced the speaker of the evening, a Mr. Vandelet. When this apostle arose some of the people arose also and made for the door. This movement exasperated Mr. Pratt exceedingly. Said he: "People think they can do anything in a tent. They get that idea at camp-meetings. They come here and go when they please. I would hav more respect for a speaker than that. The worst Infidel on Manhattan Island would sit still in church when he got there. If he couldn't, I giv him credit for staying away. It seems to me," he went on with increased bitterness, "that all respect, and reverence too, went out of this world years ago, and if they hav ever come back, they havn't found their way into these tent-meetings yet." Having relieved himself to this extent, Mr. Pratt sat down, and Elder Vandelet came to the front of the platform and read a text which he construed to mean that every man is either for or against Christ. He related that antediluvian anecdote about an old lady who, being asked by the parson if she loved Jesus, replied that she "hadn't got nothing agin' him." This worthy old lady, the speaker continued, had fallen into a very common error. There were three classes of men who were against Christ: one was the indifferent man, who took no interest in religion any way; the second was the lukewarm Christian who went to church every Sunday, believed the Bible and all that sort of thing, but had never given his heart to Christ; and the third and most hopeless class of all was the outspoken Infidel. The first class were silly men, the second class were fools, and the third class were unspeakably impious; words were inadequate and tongue too feeble to describe the present state of such blasphemers, and their last state would be worse than the first. He didn't care for the momen whether the Christian religion was true or not, or whether such a man as Jesus Christ ever lived on earth or not; religion gave him joy, and it was sufficient for him that he could say,

"——It is naught to me
Who shall be saved and who be damned,
For grace shall still exalted be,
And saints rejoice though hell be crammed."

This was all taken in by the Irishman with a green shade over his eye, and he signified his thorough approval by frequent ejaculations of, "Be dad, that's so."

At the close of Bro. Vandelet's remarks, Mr. Pratt had another struggle to keep the impatient congregation in their seats long enough to receive the benediction, and it was only by expressing in the most unqualified terms his opinion of people who would leave before the services were over that he succeeded in inducing a few to remain. As it was, the majority heard the final amen with their hats on.

The young man from THE TRUTH SEEKER office wanted to stay to the prayer-meeting in the little tent, but Mr. Pratt inquired so minutely into the state of his mind, and concerning his standing as a Christian, that the water grew deep around him, and he swam out; while the esoteric few filed in under the close-communion canvas and dropped the flap of the tent behind them.

The sentiment enunciated by the Teuton may be set down as one of the most apiculated of aphorisms —"The longer we liv, the more we find, by Jesus Christ, out."

Absolutism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is"—bigotry.

Bigotry is the true word in this passage of scripture. Bigotry is the finale and the inale, the all in all, of the religion of faith ignoring reason, of the government of arrogance denying liberty.

Absolutism is the ism of isms. Upon the foundation of assumed perfections is built the prison house of the church and the slaughter-house of the state. We are the people, and you are our subjects; we are to say, and you are to obey, is the pronunciamento of the ecclesia—falsely self-called.

The governments of the world hav always allowed a priestly control; indeed, it has always been impossible to tell where the church ended and the state began in the amalgamation of civic and deific polity. In all practical intents and purposes these two hav been one, and Dagon the appropriate emblem of the enormity.

The founders of this republic ignored the doctrin, denied the authority, of both gods and fishes, angels and fables in civil affairs, and erected a government of men for men, by men; with no God in the Constitution, and no priest in the administration.

But the priests remained in the land, and being priests they must rule ; not to rule is to be not a priest.

Therefore, it is falsely claimed that this is a Christian nation, and it is intended by those who arrogate the power to bind on earth, in heaven, and in hell, to put their fish-god, their devil-god, their angry, repenting, lying, licentious God in the Constitution that they may thereby hav the form of law to sustain them in what they hav thus far been disadvantaged in doing without law, that is, bending the reason and conscience of the people to the will of the priesthood.

Religion means a repetition of bondage; the religious are the doubly and trebly tied up. Religion is therefore a snare, a net, a fetter, a prison house, a dungeon, a grave. Religion is the denial of improvement, the preventiv of progression, not merely in its incident, but in its essence—because it is absolute; God's will—law.

Whatever it be assumed and believed to be God's will, no matter what its character, must, under the government of religious absolutism, be accounted just and wise; and whoever contradicts it, no matter with how much show of honesty and mercy, nothing is too bad for him.

Catholic bigotry, Mohammedan bigotry, Jewish bigotry, Buddhist bigotry, are only different in name, and Protestant bigotry falls no farther behind than its many sects deny it the power to execute. The doctrin of all is, unless you belong to the church and pay the priest you are damned, and being damned you hav no rights and privileges with men.

This is why the Freethinker makes war upon religion and its institutions; by it he is denied the exercise and possession of himself; by it he is nobody and nothing; by it he is a servant and a chattel if he yields a quiescent assent.

Knowledge, liberty—these belong together, and the American government is their humanly constituted protector. It belongs to the Liberalist to deeply concern himself in politics, to subvert the boasting intrigue of all bigots, and preserve this nation of freemen (and may the women soon be free, also) a freehold of reason and a citadel of humanity, over which absolutism shall hav no power, and before which superstition shall dissolve and fade away.

A WEEK IN SCOTLAND.

EDINBURGH, Sunday, Aug. 14, 1881.

MY DEAR READERS: We parted at Greenock just after the steamer had come to anchor and as the tender was putting us on shore. We at once took cars for Glasgow, some twenty-two miles up the river Clyde. The ride is a beautiful one, a part of the way by the side of the river, with its shipping and its extensive iron ship yards, where many of the leviathan iron ships are in course of construction; and a larger share of the way we were some little distance from the river, and passed several flourishing towns, the largest of which is Paisley, seven or eight miles below Glasgow, celebrated for its manufactures, notably Clark's spool cotton, known the world over. There is hardly a woman in America who has not used Clark's spool cotton, and found it better than almost any other. We saw the extensive factory in which it is spun, and also the fine town hall, built by the present of $100,000 made by Mr. G. A. Clark, of the firm that manufactures the cotton. It is a fine and substantial looking building. Paisley has a population of 47,500, and is beautifully situated on the White Cart river. It has fine public buildings of hewn stone, and every house and even every cottage is of a neat, substantial character, and every wall dividing the dwellings and gardens of the more humble residences is neatly laid in mortar, and one is at once impressed with the fact that building and all other work is here done to last. Nothing is seen of a temporary, shabby, tumble-down character, and this is also true of all the towns I have visited in Scotland. The houses are chiefly of stone, the walls heavy, and everything of the most permanent kind. There is also a general exhibition of fine taste in a large part of the suburban homes of the towns and villages. Flower beds and parterres are numerous and beautiful. This remark will apply to all the better places I have seen, but the homes of the peasants, the farmers, I am sorry to say, are too often very humble—low stone or concrete houses with small windows and a thatch roof, without any yard in front, usually without a shrub or flower in sight, and generally joined on to the yard or stable. These humble homes are much less cheerful than they might be. The difference between the conditions of the rich and the poor is far more marked than it ought to be. The homes of the poor, though humble, should be neat and cheerful.

There is a somewhat noted cathedral in Paisley, with a sounding aisle, remarkable for its echoes. Here also were buried several of the ancient kings of Scotland. One of the suburbs, Elderslie, is the birth-place of William Wallace, the celebrated Scottish chief of giant proportions, with patriotism and valor equal to his enormous physique. The entire distance is dotted with neat and flourishing villages.

Arriving in Glasgow before 9 A.M., I at once attended to mailing my letters, so that friends at home might as early as possible be apprised of our safe arrival in the land of Bruce and Wallace and Burns. Glasgow is a fine city of 700,000 inhabitants, including its suburbs; it is decidedly a thrifty business place, and is composed of the most substantial stone buildings, erected with good taste. We spent the day in looking about the city, visiting the steel manufactories, which are here conducted on the most extensive scale; but I will leave a general description of Glasgow until we return there and finish its inspection.

On Thursday morning, the twelfth, at seven o'clock, we took the beautiful steamer Columba for a visit to the Highlands, the extreme northern point to be visited being Inverness, called "the capital of the Highlands." I must say a word in praise of the steamer Columba. She is constructed for great speed, having a double oscillating engine of two hundred and fifty horse-power, constructed of steel and in the strongest, neatest manner. Being a small-sized steamer, this great power makes her go like the wind. I am sure I never saw a steamer make such rapid speed before. Her regular rate is twenty-two miles an hour. She is a side-wheeler, with a slim, graceful shape, and cuts the waves most beautifully. I am told she belongs to the Cunard line, and no expense was spared in her construction. Her cabins are neat and rich, the dining saloon in keeping, the bar gorgeous and well supplied, the accomodations of all kinds of the very first character, including bath-rooms, ladies' and gents' retiring rooms, barber shop, post-office, fruit stands, book tables, with ample provisions for not less than a score of people to write, a privilege which was embraced by many. I think not less than two hundred and fifty were on board, including English, some French, several Americans, with a large preponderance of Scotch people going north for summer pleasure. This being the day when by act of Parliament grouse-shooting is begun, doubtless many are now attracted to the northern hills for this particular purpose, abundant chance among the Highlands being afforded for both hunting and fishing.

The ride down the Clyde was most enjoyable. For some miles we passed the largest iron ship building yards in the world. Here were thousands of men hammering away in the most busy manner at the great iron leviathans in all stages of construction, from the setting up of the skeletons with solid iron keel and ribs to the finishing off of the fine, stately steamers. Hundreds of men were riveting on the heavy steel plates; and by the thousands of bolts which we saw men putting in their places red-hot, and riveting down in the strongest manner, it would seem that these powerful iron ships ought never to give way. I hardly before had a correct appreciation of their immense strength. Plates of rolled steel from half an inch to an inch thick, twenty feet long, and four feet wide, are bolted on to the strong iron ribs, standing near together, in such a manner that it would seem that the immense power of the waves of old ocean might dash and pound against them forever in vain. I think we must have seen not less than fifty of these tremendous iron ocean steamers in process of construction in the several yards as we steamed down the Clyde; and oh, what a pounding! what a din of industry!

I must say right here that the people of Glasgow are deserving of the highest praise for the enterprise and energy evinced in making their thrifty town what it is. The Clyde was originally a shallow, insignificant stream, up which the smallest sloop scarce dared to venture, but by dredging it out for twenty miles they have made it a stream on which the largest iron ships in the world can ride with safety, and have made their city second only to London in the British empire, and one of the first commercial points in the world. The dredging has still to be continued. We saw dredging machines at work capable of taking up five hundred tons of dirt per hour. The iron manufactures of this Pittsburg of Europe are of the grandest and most extensive character, as I will tell about further along. The motto, "Let Glasgow flourish," was first spoken more than fifty years ago, and the injunction has been fully obeyed—it has flourished to a marvelous extent.

After leaving the ship-building yards we passed several places of interest and beauty while making our way to the Firth of Clyde, where the river broadens out into a large bay or arm of the sea. Fifteen miles west of Glasgow, between the Clyde and the Leven, stands Dumbarton Castle. It is partly natural rock, with buildings constructed upon it. It was a stronghold of the Romans when they held power upon this island. It is thought to be Ossian's Balclutha, and was the metropolitan seat of the kingdom of Strathclyde, or Cumbria. It has been a royal fort from the commencement of the Scoto-Saxon monarchy till the present time. It made at different times a great figure in public affairs up to the end of the reign of Mary. The rock rises naturally from a plain, measures about a mile in circuit round the base, and is 260 feet in hight to its loftiest point. In its upper part it is split into two cones. The superimposed buildings are chiefly a rampart wall, two batteries, a governor's house, barracks for 150 men, and an armory with 1,000 stand of arms. A small structure is here pointed out as the place where William Wallace was imprisoned. The town of Dumbarton is a mile north of the castle, and was the Theodosia of the Romans. It is a town of considerable size, having eight churches.

Greenock is on the south shore of the Firth of Clyde, twenty-one miles from Glasgow by water, and a mile and a half further by rail. From a small fishing village of the seventh century, it has grown to be a city of fair proportions, with its ship-yards, sugarrefineries, and manufactories of divers kinds, containing many points of interest, and surrounded by scenery as lovely as is often met with. We waited here an hour for the arrival of the London train, which brought us a considerable addition to our numbers. We steamed down the Firth of Clyde for several miles, when, by a small arm of the sea, we turned to the right and followed in a general northwest direction, winding through lakes (always called lochs here) and narrow channels, well dotted with towns and beautiful residences of the wealthy, the whole presenting a series of most picturesque and interesting views. A ride up the Rhine presents a continuation of lovely scenery; a ride up our own Hudson is also replete with lovely charms; but our ride to-day from the Firth of Clyde, in our sinuous course through various lakes, to the northern extremity of Loch Fyne to the town of Ardrishaig, is one of the most lovely in the world. The surface of the earth hereabouts seems pretty evenly divided between land and water, both being of irregular shapes and forms. The land is well supplied with flourishing villages, country seats, and charming retreats.

I will not attempt to give the names of all the points we touched with our magnificent steamer, but we made many calls, putting off and taking on numerous passengers, occasionally learning little bits of local matters of interest, seeing the ruins of some old castle, or passing near the birth-place of some noted Scottish chieftain or man of valor.

At every point touched we saw such a general turn-out of people dressed up in good style that I ventured to ask an intelligent-looking gentleman if this was a holiday, that so many people should be out celebrating it. He said: "Oh, no, it is nothing unusual. The people only come out to see the boat make its landing, and it is so nearly every day." Then I marveled how so many of them could take the time to do this without neglecting the means of procuring a livelihood.

We called at Tarbert, noted for its herring fisheries, and where the land is so rocky that it would seem that fishing was about the only resource left by which the people can live. Here Robert Bruce once lived, and, in my opinion, he showed good sense in looking up another location. This point is more rocky than any point reached until we got further north, where the rocks increase, and the mountains, which are simply piles of rocks, grow taller and more picturesque. The diversity and loveliness of the scenery for scores of miles defy description. There is hardly anything in the world equal to it.

At Ardrishaig our beautiful steamer reached the end of her journey, and unloaded a large share of her passengers, some returning with her to Glasgow. Here the Crenin Canal commences, and a walk of five minutes brought us from the Columba to the Linnet, a small steamer built expressly for the navigation of this canal. Our numbers were sufficient to load her to her full capacity.

The canal is some nine miles in length, connecting Loch Fyne at the foot of Loch Gilp with a large arm of the sea outside. The canal has some ten or twelve locks, nine of which we passed through. It was constructed in 1791–1801 at an expense of nearly $1,000,000, and afterward improved at a cost of $500,000 more. The passage of the locks was effected with reasonable celerity, and the two hours required to make the passage of the canal afforded diversity to the day's ride. At the termination we found the steamer Iona in waiting for us. Though not so fine a boat as the Columba, nor quite so rapid, still she is very good, and glided with us to the romantic town of Oban in four or five hours, affording us an excellent opportunity for taking in the ranges of rocky hills and rocky domes which line the passage mile after mile and scores of miles after scores of miles.

We had now reached the Highlands in good earnest, and they consist principally of huge hills of rocks thrown around by the powerful hand of nature in the surrounding waters in the most fascinating manner. The rocks are mostly green, though thousands upon thousands of acres of them have very little earth upon them. Where there is a little earth grass makes a feeble growth. Where grass cannot succeed, heather, a small, extra-hardy shrub, covers thousands of acres, giving the brown appearance peculiar to it; and where the heather cannot find enough earth to sustain life, a kind of moss serves to give the otherwise bare rocks a greenish hue. It rains so frequently in this country that vegetation on the rocks, such as it is, rarely dries up, even if the earth is extremely scanty. But there are no forests in this country. No woods are seen upon the mountain sides, as in our country; nothing but the everlasting bare rocks, save the scant verdure mentioned.

To my surprise people are living in considerable numbers up among these rocky ranges and domes, and the buildings are principally of a neat and substantial character. How the people live I could not divine—probably by fishing in great part. A patch of levelish ground a rod or two wide and twenty to forty rods long makes a desirable farm. On every such patch a house is sure to be seen. The crop is principally grass, with a piece of oats or barley where there is land enough to admit of it, with potatoes and ever-present turnip field in the farming districts. But little of farm crops of any kind are seen among the Highlands proper. I wondered again and again as we passed these everlasting hills what the Macdougals, the Rob Roys, the McGregors, the Campbells, the Camerons, and those heroes of a few centuries back could find to fight for among these Highlands. But here were their homes, here their affections were anchored, here their Highland Marys and loving sweethearts dwelt, and that was enough to fight for. Probably the Highland homes were as dear to the owners as any in the world, and no set of men fought for their homes more readily and more bravely than did the Highlanders of three and four hundred years ago.

We reached Oban, called the "Queen of the Highlands," at about six o'clock, which afforded us ample time to climb its rocky hill in the rear and view the peerless little bay in front of us, with its little steamers and sailing craft of chiefly small dimensions. Here we were to pass the night. Oban is a new town of some 5,000 inhabitants, domiciled in the most substantial stone buildings, both by the water's edge and upon the rocky steeps at an elevation of two hundred feet. There are some thirty summer hotels. Some of these are romantically located on the hillside, presenting a view of the bay below, crescent side toward the sea. We climbed up above the town, looked at the continuous piles of rocks, extending back for miles, and saw many beautiful mansions, the homes of the rich. Here we found soil enough to sustain vegetation, and every advantage was taken of it in growing evergreens and some deciduous trees, flowers, etc. The trees have all to be planted, as I believe no trees grow spontaneously in this country. In the evening we heard some very good music by a brass band playing for the pleasure of the guests of the Craigard Hotel. We were not guests of that aristocratic hotel, but we nevertheless enjoyed the music.

The stores are small but neat, and everything has a solid and tasteful appearance. One would hardly doubt that the inhabitants are Highlanders by the names on the signs in the place—the Macdougals, the McFarlins, the Fergussons, the McGregors, the Fraziers, etc., appear often, and the Christian names Donald, Duncan, etc., do not detract from the Scottish characteristics. I notice the females of the locality with interest. They look healthy, red-cheeked, and robust. They walk with head erect, and with an independent, determined, self-reliant air, but, to confess the truth, I see but few that I call really pretty. Though they look ruddy and fresh, without the slightest traces of biliousness in their countenances, there is a tendency to strongly-marked or large features, with a trifle of grossness in their appearance, and this I have thus far thought to be characteristic of Scottish women, though I have seen some very pretty. As a rule, I think the men are quite as good looking as the women. There is nothing of the sallow, cadaverous style of countenance in either. I have seen many lasses with cheeks so red, so high colored, indeed, as to lead one to think some deep red paint had been applied; but nature is the artist that applies the paint.

At Oban I realized that this is not a hot climate. Overcoats and gloves are decidedly a necessity, and without them one would shiver in discomfort. I never saw such cool weather in August before. At night seven thicknesses of blankets and spreads were upon our beds, and we found it convenient to let them remain. These were not too many. The sheets and blankets are of home manufacture and very heavy. Every person who lives or travels in this country is well prepared with overcoats, wraps, and warm "habits" like what our people wear in the coldest weather. The ladies wear furs and cloaks and woolen over-garments, as would be worn in our country in January. The luckless wight who ventures abroad without an overcoat shivers and shrugs his shoulders as a penalty for his improvidence. I call it regular November weather for our part of the world. And to think this is the warm season of the year, that this is summer, and that people rush up here to enjoy the Highland coolness! While you at this moment undoubtedly are sweltering with the heat away up in the nineties, wishing for a cool breath of air, we are shivering with the cold, wishing that the weather would turn a little warmer. The thermometer ranges here from 50 to 60. They say last summer the weather was extremely warm, and some days reached the great hight of 80 degrees. It has not reached that altitude this year.

I must say a word also about the rain. It rains oftener here than in any country I ever visited. Let me give you some idea of it. On our first day in Scotland it rained fifteen times, and perhaps it was not a right good day for rain either. The second was an unusually fine day, and it only rained three times; the two following days were about of an average class, and could only boast of six rains each day. This day has been a most remarkable day, and has absolutely passed without any rain at all, but to-night the air is raw and cold, and an overcoat is a welcome companion. With all these rains, however, but little water has fallen. I have known more water to fall in our country in five minutes than has fallen here in five days. It falls here very gradually and in fine drops, and is perhaps little more than a Scotch mist. But the remarkable part of it is how easily and frequently the rain comes. Once in a while it will partially clear off and look some as though it had not rained for a week and would not for a week to come, and perhaps in less than fifteen minutes it will be raining again, with a good prospect for a long spell of falling weather. I have wondered how, with the cold weather, crops can grow at all, and how, with the constant rain, they can be harvested and secured. The natives do say, however, that this is an unusually cold, rainy summer. As a consequence the crops look unpromising. The turnips especially are very poor—not half as large as they should be at this season. If they fail, the cattle and sheep must suffer in the long winter. Grass is now being cut and generally turns out pretty well. The oats are very green and short,; the barley is turning, and in two weeks will perhaps be ready for the harvest. No grain has been cut hereabouts yet. Before and since visiting the Highlands I have seen a few fields of wheat; it does not look well, but is short and thin.

We were up betimes at Oban and aboard the steamer Mountainier, and at half past six started for a still more northern country. As we passed up the lakes and arms of the sea we saw more mountains of rocks, more sterile hillsides, now and then a village of small size, occasionally the ruins of an old Highland chieftain's castle, with small stone houses by the water's edge, quite frequently in country so hard that obtaining a living there would seem wholly impracticable. Many of the points touched are very romantic, and the entire scenery is picturesque in the extreme; but there is so much of it that it is possible one fails to appreciate it to the fullest extent. Fort William is an old town situated on one of the lakes we passed through, and has a castle hard by with historical reminiscences of battles and bloodshed. Not far from this, towards the east, rises the celebrated mountain Ben-Nevis, the highest ground in Great Britain or Ireland, reaching the hight of 4,400 feet. It is an independent mountain, being disconnected from those in the immediate neighborhood. It is some twenty-six miles around its base. It rises in grand proportions and has an obtuse top, not an apex or sharp point, as many hills of the country have. Compared with the Alps it is a mere pigmy, their highest altitudes being 15,000 feet. But Ben-Nevis is a stately fellow, and well may the Scotch be proud of it. Burns and others have sung its praises.

At Bennavie we left the steamer and took huge omnibuses for about a mile to the steamer Glengary on the Caledonian Canal, which is twenty-four miles in length, in three parts, connecting Loch Eil, Loch Lochy, and Loch Ness, making sixty-two miles in a straight line to Inverness. These lakes are rather narrow, with ranges of rocky hills on either side, of the same picturesque character as before described. Some of the hills are covered with grass, and upon them we saw thousands of sheep feeding. We also saw thousands of acres of heather, bearing a pink flower. This shrub's only value is for making brooms. We saw also a large growth of furze, a low, scraggy growth, a few feet in hight, of very little value, save that sheep will sometimes eat it when nothing else can be had. We also saw considerable broom, a rather neat shrub with long, slim twigs, which when bound together make very fair brooms. The heather is now in bloom, and its neat blossoms are very pretty. The water in portions of the lakes is very deep, varying from five hundred to nine hundred feet. This depth, with a thousand feet of altitude of the rocks above the water, shows that nature is given to some unevenness of character. The Caledonian Canal was constructed in the first part of the present century, at a cost of $7,000,000. It is sixty or eighty feet in width, and twenty-five in depth, and, like the Crenin Canal, its banks are skilfully walled the entire distance. There are ten, or more, locks in the canal, and as they are large and deep, and the gates massive, the passage of the steamer through them is necessarily slow. There are some pleasant villages along the canal, though the country is of the most rugged character. At the entrance of Loch Ness is Fort Augustus, quite a tasteful village, with a fine, large monastery, capable of accomodating two or three hundred students. It seems a little out of place to see a monastery in Presbyterian Scotland, but the Highlanders were formerly Catholics, and they still maintain quite a foothold here. As there are five locks together at the village we had over an hour to walk about and patronize the four or five small stores of the place, buying trinkets and mementos of the locality.

When about midway through Loch Ness the steamer stopped to allow the passengers to view the Falls of Foyers, a rapid stream rushing down the rocky mountain declivity of chasm, precipice, and glen. It is by far the largest fall in Great Britain, and is thought to be extremely grand. It is more a cascade than an independent fall, as the water partly dashes down the precipitous rocks in the wildest manner. There are really two falls, one above the other, one of forty, and the other of ninety feet. It is grand, but I estimated it would take a million such to make one Niagara. It was worth the walk and climb we had of three-fourths of a mile to reach it; nevertheless, we easily realized how much America surpasses the old world in the matter of waterfalls.

Several miles south of Inverness we left the Highlands, and found a comparatively level country, with much improved agricultural facilities. We reached the town in the rain about 8 P.M., and soon the passengers scattered around to the various hotels for accomodations for the night. As for us, we stopped at the Glenaloen Hotel, kept by Miss Isabel Ross, and have to speak in the highest terms of its good accommodations.

Inverness is well built of stone, and contains 18,000 inhabitants, mostly intelligent, frugal people. The town is called the capital of the Highlands, though really the Highlands are hardly to be seen from its limits. This is a high latitude—fifty-eight degrees, I believe—the farthest north I ever was, and probably ever will be. I find it does not get dark so early here as further south, as at the latitude of New York, and were we to keep on to the north pole we should now find it perpetual day. We had ample time to see the town, to visit Castle Hill, and to look through the building of massive walls nearly four feet in thickness, used now as a court-house. Some of the stores are quite fine, and the buildings are nearly all of a very good description. The renting of hunting and shooting grounds is quite a business here, and I noticed several signs out to that effect. An attractive feature of Inverness is its cemetery, nearly a mile from the town, on a natural mound, regular in shape, about half a mile around its base, and tapering gradually to an obtuse apex one hundred and fifty feet high. It is tastefully set out with trees, among which the graves and monuments are plentiful.

Early yesterday morning we took the train on the Highland Railway via Forres and Keith for Aberdeen on the east coast of Scotland. We passed the battle-ground of Culloden, where the cohorts of Charles were defeated one hundred and forty years ago. We also passed Brodie Castle, where Burns stopped when he visited this northern country. He wrote in the diary of his hostess that Lady Brodie was very nice, but not equal to some women he had seen.

We passed through a pleasant agricultural country, which with favorable weather would unquestionably produce good crops, though portions of it are not very rich. It turns out good hay, oats, barley, and turnips, though the latter are looking badly this year. More trees are visible, though probably cultivated, and no hills are in sight, it being an entirely different country from the rock mountains of the Highlands. Nothing of moment was to be seen till we reached the old city of Aberdeen, noted for its two colleges, one of which Byron attended when quite a young man. Five or six hours' ride brought us to this solid old city of 100,000 inhabitants. Its principal street (Union street) is nearly a mile in length, a hundred feet in width, and remarkably well built of granite, though the buildings are not particularly tall. This is a granite city; extensive granite quarries are in its vicinity, and by far the greater portion of the edifices are of this material, and some of them wrought and polished with decided skill. Many of the residences are palatial and ornate. Great Britain hardly furnishes anything finer in its way. Union street crosses a ravine in the center of the town, which is spanned by a fine granite bridge, built at a cost of about $75,000.

Aberdeen is an ancient royal burgh, at the mouth of the Dee, a great sea-port, a place of considerable manufacture, and is the fourth city in Scotland, the three others being Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee. It has five large hotels, a university, a finely equipped harbor, and an annual revenue of over $200,000. Its principal edifices are the municipal and county buildings, costing $300,000, a music hall, a theater and opera house, Marischal college, the bank of Scotland, an infirmary, and several fine churches. It has a monument of polished granite some eighty feet high in front of the college, one to the Duke of Gordon, a statue to Queen Vic, and another to her consort, Prince Albert. What is called the Old Town, formerly Seaton, is a mile north of the main city, and is now quite antiquated and little more than a sequestered village.

We visited one of the granite quarries a mile and a half in the rear of the town, whence for scores of years immense quantities of granite have been taken for building purposes, monuments, and other uses, and shipped in all directions, some even reaching America. We saw about a hundred men busily at work at the bottom of the quarry, nearly a hundred feet below the surface, drilling, tearing, and blasting. Here blocks for monuments and pedestals, weighing forty or fifty tons, are raised from the bottom by steam with an immense crane. The smaller blocks, for building purposes, are elevated in a huge iron pan or tray, which hoists a ton or two at a time; the engine winds it up in a hurry and the crane lands it where desired. The red granite is also obtained in the vicinity, and when polished looks particularly rich and makes beautiful contrasts with the gray. It is a very hard kind of stone to work, and requires the most persistent blows and pecking at to bring it to desired forms. We visited the yards of the city where monuments are made and saw much excellent workmanship in this line.

At 4 P. M. we took the train for Perth, nearly one hundred miles south-west. Soon after leaving Aberdeen we rode several miles in view of the German Ocean, and saw a large number of boats and small vessels engaged in the herring fishery, which is probably more extensive here than anywhere else in the world. Many come here from France, Germany, and Denmark, and spend months at the herring fishing. We noticed vessels being towed in laden with the herrings to be salted down, when it is shipped in great quantities. It is well for the lovers of this fish that it is so prolific.

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE APOSTOLIC WOMEN.

Having finished Jesus's women, we now take up those that ministered unto Paul and the apostles. The names of some twenty are given, and about as many more spoken of, who are nameless, the majority of whom were workers with and helpers of the apostles.

It appears (Acts i, 14) that "the women and Mary, the mother of Jesus," were waiting in Jerusalem in the "upper room" for the celebrated day of Pentecost (Acts ii), and participated in it, for Peter, in his defense against the charge of drunkenness, quoted from Joel, ". . . Your daughters shall prophesy, and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my spirit," passages often referred to by Spiritualists as authority for the same among themselves.

After the Pentecost, and Peter had healed the "man lame from his mother's womb," and their number had increased to five thousand men, they formed a "community of goods," says Brown, though Acts iv, 32, states they had all things in common, from which text the famous Oneida Community take their authority to include the sexes, contending and maintaining that the scripture is on their side, but the evangelical Christians two years since forced them practically to yield that point. Socialism and Communism were early established in the Christian church.

This community business resulted in the tragical death of two of the disciples at Jerusalem. Ananias sold his goods for the benefit of the church, but kept back a part of the price, bringing to the apostles the remainder, as if it were the whole, his wife Sapphira being privy to it. Peter, it seems, was a good clairvoyant or medium, for the deception was perceived by him, though Smith terms it "the power of the spirit that enabled him to see the fraud," and he denounced Ananias as having lied to the Holy Ghost. On hearing this he fell down and gave up the ghost. He was carried out and buried without apprising Sapphira, and when she ignorantly came in three hours after Peter fell to quizzing her, and she said, "Yea, for so much" we sold the land. Then Peter gave her a blast, ending with, "Behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out!" Then down she fell and yielded up the ghost, and they carried her forth and buried her by her husband, and great fear came upon all. (Acts i, 12.)

Smith says: "That this incident was no mere physical consequence of St. Peter's severity of tone . . . distinctly appears by the direct sentence of a similar death pronounced by the same apostle upon his wife Sapphira a few hours after. It is, of course, possible that Ananias's death may have been an act of divine justice unlooked for by the apostle, but in the case of the wife, such an idea is out of the question." Brown declares "this effect on the Christian community itself was the chief design of so startling a judgment." How does he know? The account does not affirm it.

We are not sure, however, should such an event occur if a modern medium should thus denounce a lying Christian, but what the former would suffer arrest, trial, and perhaps execution as the cause of the death, especially if the medium was as notorious a liar as was St. Peter, who, it will be remembered, told a whopper and washed it down with cursing and swearing, while his Lord and master was being led away to crucifixion to atone for his oaths and lies, yours and mine and every one's else.

Is it not queer that such a recorded liar as was Peter should have been chosen as the agent of the Holy Ghost, to have thus anathematized and put to death this couple, who were disciples of the Lord like himself? Is it possible that Peter, Paul, and the others, with all the followers of Jesus for eighteen hundred years, have never told as big a lie as that acted one? If they have, why has not God struck them dead if he is just and impartial? Why? Because he is the Lord, and besides him there is none else (Isaiah xlv, 5, 6). Could Peter have forgotten his own lie when he so unfeelingly convicted and sentenced Sapphira? Was the retaining a part of the price as great a crime as denying the knowledge of his Lord and master? Answer ye who best know.

Soon after Paul's conversion (chap. ix), and while Peter was in Lydda healing Eneas, an eight-year bedridden paralytic (verse 32), Tabitha, also called Dorcas, a female disciple of Joppa, died. As none of the disciples but Peter possessed miraculous power, they sent to him to come without delay. When he arrived he found the body washed and laid in an upper chamber, surrounded by the recipients of her charity, for she had been full of good works and almsdeeds. But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down and prayed, and then commanded her by name to arise, and she opened her eyes, and when she saw Peter she sat up, and he gave her his hand and presented her to them alive, and it is said this was known throughout all Joppa. Do you believe it?

This is the only account of any disciple raising any one from the dead, unless Paul bringing life into the young man when he fell from the third loft and was taken up dead be considered such.

All these wonderful things may be classed with those of which it is said "distance lends enchantment to the view," eighteen hundred years being a long distance in the remote past, demanding that these marvels be received with a broad latitude of belief, especially when liars are the chief operators and testators, and all are put out of the room but themselves and the pretended corpse. But Dorcas is alive again and ready to work on coats and garments as before for the widows and orphans.

We must pass over all the marvelous doings of Peter except those that relate to women. In passing we read (chap. xii, 12–17) that after he had escaped by angel power from the prison "he came to the house of Mary the mother of John, whose surname was Mark; where many were gathered together, praying. And as Peter knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came to hearken, named Rhoda. And when she knew Peter's voice, she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told how Peter stood before the gate. And they said unto her, Thou art mad. But she constantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, It is his angel. But Peter continued knocking. And when they had opened the door and saw him they were astonished. But he, beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison." And these Christian men and women assembled there in prayer believed this unveracious man when he related that an angel of the Lord smote him on the side, his chains fell off, the iron gate opened of its own accord, and he came to himself in the street. And, moreover, all Christians believe it to-day, and because we Liberals refuse our credence we deserve to be damned, and shall be, they say. But ask them to believe that the Davenports were brought out of jail in a similar manner, and they will tell you that you deserve to be damned for believing that. So we can suit them only by believing all the miracles in their book and rejecting all others.

It seems also that these ancient Christians were so foolish as to believe that angels came to doors and knocked. Is it possible that spirit rappings, that modern Christians so deplore and despise, are synonymous with those old angel knockings?

We read (chap. xiii, 50, and xvii, 12) that in Antioch and Berea the apostles made proselytes among the devout and honorable women, some of whom were Greeks, and that in Antioch the Jews stirred up these women, and the chief men of the city, and raised a persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts; in view of which Brown says, these women "were female proselytes of distinction, jaundiced against the new preachers by those Jewish ecclesiastics to whom they had learned to look up. The potent influence of the female character, both for and against the truth, is seen in every age of the church's history." True, and never more so than now, for woman with the ballot will vote God into the national Constitution when Henry Ward tells his Elizabeth so to do, and if the priest thus instructs Bridget under the penalties of endless damnation. Brown adds, "To expel the apostles was easier than to refute them." Wonder if Christians do not find it easier now to expel than to refute heretic Infidels—Ingersoll, for instance, in Delaware.

The mother of Timothy or Timotheus is introduced in Acts xvi, 1, as a certain woman which was a Jewess, and believed, but his father was a Greek. Paul (2 Tim. i, 5) gives further information by referring to the unfeigned faith that is in thee (Timothy) which first dwelt in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice, and in thee also. It seems Paul believed in heredity, and that this faith in these good old ladies had been transferred to the young man and developed by the laying on of his own hands, he frequently calling him his dearly-beloved son (2 Tim. iii, 15) who from a child knew the holy scriptures. What an inducement for the modern Loises and Eunices to teach their little ones at their knee to repeat the Lord's Prayer, to send them to Sunday-school, and furnish them with religious literature that the children may know the scriptures, and the grandmothers and mothers be honored for thus furnishing sons for the ministry, as did these women, and Christian daughters for ministers' wives and missionary purposes.

Paul, Silas, Timothy, and the writer of Acts came to Philippi (xvi, 12, 13) and on the Jewish Sabbath went outside of the city, and by a river-side held a prayer-meeting consisting wholly of women, and these not all Jewish. Here Lydia is converted and her whole household baptized. She was at that time a Jewish proselyte of Thyatira in the province of Asia, and was Paul's first European convert. She besought them to make her house their home. She was a person of considerable wealth, a seller of purple, her native city being celebrated for its dyeing, she receiving her goods from there, and having an establishment large enough to accommodate this missionary party for several weeks. (Brown.) She was a valuable convert. It was during their stay here as they went to prayer that a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination followed them, and Paul, in the name of Jesus Christ, commanded the spirit to come out of her, and he came out the same hour (Would you not like to have seen him coming?), which so enraged her masters, who saw the hope of their gain gone, that they caught Paul and Silas, scourged, manacled, and imprisoned them, on which occasion, it is alleged, they were miraculously set free, and the jailer, with all his household, converted and baptized. When they left the prison they returned to the house of Lydia, remaining there and comforting the brethren until they departed. Thus did Lydia and these good sisters entertain the apostles of the new and then despised heretical religion. Brown says, "The reality of this demoniacal possession (the damsel's) is as undeniable as any in gospel history." It will be remembered that she divined that these apostles were "servants of the most high God." Of course sorcery that approved of Christianity would be indorsed as genuine by modern commentators.

We also read (chap. xxi, 8, 9) that Philip, one of the seven evangelists, had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy. Smith adds, "Who apparently gave themselves to the work of teaching, instead of entering on the life of home." How does that agree with Paul, "I suffer not a woman to teach" (1 Tim. i, 12)? and, "Let your women keep silence in the churches" (1 Cor. xiv, 34)? Here is a splendid chance for an argument with Fulton, D. D., and such as are ever crying that women's proper sphere is at home.

Paul's sister is incidentally mentioned (xxiii, 16–27) in connection with her son informing his uncle in prison of the conspiracy against his life, which caused him to be sent by Claudius "unto the most excellent governor, Felix." On his second hearing, Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, and heard Paul concerning the faith in Christ (xxiv, 2, 4). This is all the scriptures say of her, but Josephus gives her a terrible character.

Bernice, the sister of King Agrippa, was with her brother on his visit to Festus when he was consulted by the latter on Paul's case (xxv, 13), and listened to his famous defense, having come with Agrippa in great pomp into the place of hearing, with the chief captains and principal men of the city (23). When the proceedings closed, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them (xxvi, 30). So it appears that the wives and sisters of governors and kings were not excluded from the assemblies of men, and from sharing with their lords public patronage and distinction. Brown and Smith give Bernice a worse character, if possible, than does Josephus Drusilla, and perhaps it is an intrusion to place two such ungodly women among the godly. But we cannot see, even if all they are charged with is true, that they are much worse than some of those who are esteemed holy and held up as patterns by the Christians of to-day.

As we come to the last chapter of Romans, which epistle is said to have been written by Paul from Corinthus and sent to Rome by Phebe, we have a whole batch of women to whom Paul sends greeting, no less than seven by name, besides numerous others of the household of the brethren. The chapter opens with a recommendation of the female letter-carrier thus: "I commend unto you Phebe, our sister, which is a servant of the church of Cenchrea: that ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: for she hath been a succorer of many, and of myself also" (Rom. xvi, 1, 2). Paul was not such a woman hater but what he could accept aid from the sisters when in need. This and what follows is worthy of especial notice, because of its bearing on the question of deaconesses of the apostolic church. "Servant or deaconess," says Brown, and "That in the earliest churches there were deaconesses, to attend to the wants of the female members, there is no good reason to doubt. . . . Indeed, from the relation in which the sexes then stood to each other, something of this sort would seem to have been a necessity. Modern attempts, however, to revive this office have seldom found favor; either from the altered state of society or the abuse of the office, or both." Smith makes a similar admission, saying, "These women mentioned in Rom. xvi, 6, 12, belonged to such an order." It is very probable that this office was abandoned through fear that women would usurp authority over the man (1 Tim. ii, 12). In our own day, though the M. E. Society would permit Mrs. Van Cott to preach, yet would they not ordain or license her. Wherefore? Let the bishops and elders answer. We have neither time nor space, and must proceed.

"Greet Priscilla and Aquila, my helpers in Christ Jesus, who here for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the gentiles. Likewise greet the church that is in their house" (verses 3, 4, 5). And who are Priscilla and Aquila? and why is her name first here and elsewhere? Smith thinks she "was the more energetic" of the two; they are always mentioned together. Brown says she "is named before the husband, probably as being the more prominent and helpful to the church." If that rule was now followed, most husbands would come in last, as women are the help and hope of the modern church. We first hear of this couple in Acts xviii, 2, 18, then 1 Cor. xvi, 18, also 2 Tim. iv, 19. Paul found them at Corinth, to which place they had been banished from Rome, with whom he lived a year and six months, working at their common trade of making tent or hair cloth. They went with Paul to Ephesus, and from thence back to Rome, where Paul addressed to them this endearing message. They had been his saviors, if they had interposed their own necks to save his, and he ought to have been grateful. Smith thinks that "Priscilla is the example of what the married woman may do for the general service of the church, in conjunction with home duties, as Phebe is the type of the unmarried servant of the church, or deaconess." How nicely these fellows can fix up these things, and set as exemplars over the modern sisters the saints of olden times! Well, well, they wish to be equally well cared for, therefore flatter the good sisters of to-day and release them from sin in proportion as they are helpful to the church, which is themselves.

"Greet Mary, who bestowed much labor on us" (ver. 6). This is the same Mary, mother of Mark, where Peter knocked at the gate. Mark's or Marcus's sister's son is spoken of in Col. iv, 10.

"Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen" (ver. 7). "Origen conjectures that he was possibly one of the seventy disciples," says Smith, "and that his name is Junias;" while Brown thinks Junia is right, and a woman, "no doubt the wife or sister of Andronicus." Didn't God know whether this person was a man or woman when he inspired the writing of the book? Why then leave it in such doubt and confusion? Could he not prevent the inspired one from making mistakes?

"Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labor in the Lord. Salute the beloved Persis, which labored much in the Lord" (ver. 12). The two former are supposed to have been sisters, and all three deaconesses.

"Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine" (ver. 13). Rufus was the son of Simon of Cyrene, who was compelled to bear the cross at the crucifixion, therefore "his mother" was the wife of this Simon, whom Paul also appears to mother or "mine." Brown expatiates feelingly on this appellation. How do we know but Paul was sending a salutation to his own mother, since his "sister's son" was thereabouts.

"Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus and his sister, and all the saints which are with you" (ver. 15). Smith says, "Julia was probably the wife or perhaps the sister of Philologus."

Now comes the "cream of the joke"—the manner and quality of the salutation.

"Salute one another with a holy kiss" (ver. 16). This injunction is repeated in 1 Cor. xvi, 20; 2 Cor. xiii, 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; 1 Pet. v, 14. Smith informs us that "in the Christian church the kiss was practiced not only as a friendly salutation, but as an act symbolical of love and Christian brotherhood." Brown enlightens us still further with "The custom prevailed among the Jews. . . . Its adoption into the Christian churches as a symbol of a higher fellowship than it had ever expressed before, was probably as immediate as it was natural. In this case the apostle's desire seems to be that on receipt of his epistle, with its salutations, they should in this manner expressly testify their Christian affection. It afterward came to have a fixed place in the church service immediately after the celebration of the supper, and continued long in use. In such matters, however, the state of society and the peculiarities of different places require to be studied."

"Expressly testify their Christian affection with a holy kiss." This has blundered more clergymen into the lap of Christian adultery than Christ's blood can ever atone for. The command was easy to obey, both by the clergy and laity, and they well improved it under the guise of "Christian charity" and a "holy kiss." But it has not been so easy to determine where the holy kiss ended and the unholy one began. For instance, in a court of justice in Maine less than thirty years ago, a minister was arraigned upon a charge of kissing the sisters. He pleaded guilty, but declared they were holy kisses, in obedience to Christian commands. He was called upon to define a holy kiss, which was not done to the satisfaction of the court, who, it is presumed, was carnal-minded and did not understand spiritual things, which are only spiritually discerned. In hopes to get at the merits of the case the defendant was then asked to define an unholy kiss. He promptly and boldly replied, "kissing with an appetite." The inference is that a holy kiss is a kiss without an appetite. Had all the clergy thus kissed, and thus administered spiritual consolation to the sisters, the books "Sinful Saints and Sensual Shepherds," and the "Crimes of Preachers" would have been unknown. Farther comment is unnecessary, but scripture can be hauled in to sustain every crime inside of the church or outside, by those who desire to make of it a scape-goat for their wrong-doing.

A woman named Chloe is mentioned in 1 Cor. i, 2. Another by the name of Apphia in Philemon, ii, "apparently a member of Philemon's household and not unlikely his wife" (Smith).

We have now given all the recorded names of the apostolic sisters, and references to all others mentioned, and have only left "the elect lady, and her children, whom I love," to whom the elder directs the second epistle of John, but as Brown concludes the church is meant, not a woman, we will pass it over with his reason. "I beseech thee, lady, that we love one another" (ver. 5) he considers "is hardly like an apostolic precept, however pure may be the love enjoined." Perhaps Paul or John was writing a private love-letter on his own hook, and by some mistake it got among the sacred writings, and inspiration was not sufficiently strong and clear to discern carnal or matrimonial love from spiritual or Christian love. Some people now are unable to distinguish between the two, they are so similar. "They twain shall be one flesh" is not more alike.

We often hear it said by Liberals, "If it had not been for Paul" (the policy man) "we should never have heard of Jesus Christ, and the church would never have been founded." Had it not been for these women "Paul might have planted and Apollos watered," but God himself could never have given an increase. Were it not for women now the church would be nowhere in a few years. Heaven must be composed mainly of women—and babies, since infant damnation has gone out of fashion. A wrecked apology of herself, woman flies to religion as a refuge from foes in this world and for salvation in the next, and seeks to perpetuate the falsity in her offspring.

Again, keenly susceptible to suffering, the story of the cross pierces her very vitals, she loves to love her Jesus, and pours out her whole being into the bosom of this imaginary savior in deep and sacred sympathy.

Moreover, as did these women administer to the wants of the apostles and brethren, so does woman to-day in the same spirit, for the same reason, and from similar motives coddle the ministers and sustain the church. And most foully has her confidence been betrayed by these men of God. What is a prayer-meeting, a revival-meeting, or a camp-meeting but an exercise of those passions and social propensities which, uncontrolled, lead to the results of holy kissing in an unholy manner and for an unholy purpose? Ask yourselves the effect of a constant strain on the affections, this "love for Jesus," and how easy then to transfer the emotion from an absent Lord to a present man-minister. Just so with the other sex, and this blending of the two elements produces the disasters so common in the church. Men and women following its teachings fall an easy prey to the wiles of evil men leading captive silly women, and vice versa. But we refrain.

Some Good Advice.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I want through your columns to speak to the Liberalists of this country. To every one belongs a work, and that work should be to liberate some friend from the chains of slavery and superstition. Let every one procure Liberal works and papers and loan them wide-spread. In this way the light may be brought to some poor blind being groping in the dark.

If all liberal-minded men and women will take it upon themselvs to distribute whatever they may own of Liberal books and papers in this way we may double the readers of The Truth Seeker in a year. I think the duty of all who hav earned their freedom is to aid others in obtaining theirs. It is not to be expected that church-goers or church people of their own accord are going to make the first move toward Liberalism. But we must first arrest their attention; get them to begin to think for themselvs, then they will work out their own salvation.

The times are peculiar; the leaders of orthodoxy are either at loggerheads or at fault as to which course to pursue. The masses of the reading public are pausing to reflect among themselvs whether they will longer be led by blind leaders.

Now indeed we want fearless men and women to step to the front and proclaim aloud the tidings of liberty of conscience and speech.

I see that some propose building a temple in New York city. Would it not be far better for every Liberal league to found a circulating library of Liberal books and see to it that these books were read by all in their several communities who could be induced to read them? In this way the grand army of Liberals would yearly gain thousands of recruits from the ranks of the enemy or from the now indifferent noncombatants.

The subject of taxation of church property must be thoroughly discussed, not only by the Liberal press, but by the entire press of the country.

Let every reader of The Truth Seeker and every other Liberal paper in the land see to it that their paper is read, not only by themselvs and families, but by others also; let it one week be loaned to one family, and the next week to another, and so on. Soon you will hav sown the seeds of thought and inquiry; church-goers will begin to discuss these subjects when alone among themselvs, and as a result they will soon want a Liberal paper of their own. Let the Liberals of each town and city club together and place a copy of The Truth Seeker on the table of each barber shop, together with some tracts, and the result will astonish. A barber, a friend of the writer, tells that his Boston Investigator is read with real interest by those whom he knows to be strong orthodox people.

Would these people borrow or buy a copy of any Liberal paper? Not a bit of it. But they will read it with avidity in such a place.

We care not in what way we get this knowledge before them; only get it before them, and the work will be began which shall end in their emancipation from mental slavery.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Case.

Editor of Boston Commonwealth: Reading your remarks on Mr. Bradlaugh's case, and finding in them a repetition of misstatements that hav been as often denied in Mr. Bradlaugh's paper, the National Reformer, as they hav been made by his enemies, I beg leave to correct the following points: "He originally proclaimed, almost offensivly, that he was an Atheist, and that no oath would be taken by him. He went to Parliament and refused, openly, to take the oath of allegiance because it recognized a supreme being."

Some irrefutable facts I hav learned by constant reading of the National Reformer, and official reports of committees and court proceedings published therein, besides statements made by Mr. Bradlaugh himself. When first elected Mr. Bradlaugh requested of the speaker of the House to be permitted to affirm instead of taking the usual oath. He believed that he was legally entitled to do so; but he did not refuse to take the oath, nor publicly declare himself an Atheist, or state any reasons other than a preference for affirmation. He took his seat by affirmation, pending the decision of a committee appointed to determin whether the law on affirmation in court proceedings would also apply to parliamentary oath of allegiance.

The committee decided by a majority of one only that Bradlaugh's view of the law was wrong, though eminent legal authority in that committee sided with him. His seat was thereupon declared vacant, and proceedings were instituted against him to compel him to pay a fine for voting without taking the oath. He was nevertheless reëlected by the voters of Northampton, and, on presenting himself at the House of Parliament, he naturally accepted the situation and offered to take the usual oath, declaring unreservedly that it would be binding on his conscience. Yet without law or precedent Parliament voted that he should not be permitted to take the oath, because in the opinion of some few Tory bigots it would be a profanation of the oath for him to do so. Gladstone and Bright thought rightly that that was a matter which concerned Bradlaugh only.

Mr. Bradlaugh has not acted as a mere politician would, but he has been earnest, honest, and consistent throughout; and his submitting himself to the danger of forcible ejection from the House seemed necessary because his only resource. Were he to sit idly waiting for justice to be done himself and his constituents, he would certainly remain forever on the outside. The high legal talent that agreed with him in his view of the laws of affirmation gave full justification for his first step, and since his first defeat he has acted throughout as a brave, straightforward, and invincible fighter.

Lastly, Mr. Bradlaugh does not "despise and repudiate an oath," but simply regards as a meaningless form the phrase that refers to a "supreme being" in whose existence he has no faith.

We Don't Swallow It.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I notice the Chicago papers announce the conversion and reformation of two of the State street keepers of houses of ill-fame, Madam Herrick and Minnie Brooks. Madam Herrick is now quite an aged woman, sick, and ready to die. A great splurge is being made over her conversion, and that she has now had her many sins washed away, and is going to heaven without a doubt. Now, I don't want to swallow any of that kind of trash. Madam Herrick has undoubtedly been the cause of ruining as many innocent young girls, and of leading as many rather forward young men to shame and degradation as any other person, male or female, in Chicago. I do not believe in the idea of lauding her to the skies, as they are now doing in Chicago, just because she claims she has "been born again." Her days of doing good or evil in this world are passed. We are glad she is at last going to die happy, but, at the same time, we think of the almost countless number of young males and females that hav disgraced themselvs, their friends, and at last come to ruin in those dens of iniquity, and wonder how these women can now go to heaven while they, or most of them, never get this so-called conversion, and are going, or hav gone, to hell.

Leaving this locality we saw off to the right the spurs of the Grampian Hills where Norval's daddy used to feed his flocks, and other daddies are doing so still. The Grampian mountains are the eastern portion of the Highlands, and occupy an area of about a hundred miles in diameter, affording a great quantity of moor lands fitted only for sheep raising, which is carried on extensively. We saw but little of the Grampians, but instead a fine stretch of good farming country, with its neat farms and well-tilled fields. I see no slovenly farming; everything looks tidy and well-attended, and every foot of available land is occupied. Land rents all the way from five dollars to sixty dollars per acre per year, and it stands the renter in hand to obtain from it all that he possibly can. How in such a climate he can raise enough to pay his rent is passing strange. The poor toiler has a hard time of it indeed.

We had the company in the cars for three hours or more of Mr. Thomas Esplin, a young man of decided intelligence and extensive reading, whom I found an interesting companion, and from whom I learned many facts with reference to the country. He is more advanced in free and independent thought than any other man I have met with in Scotland, though he still holds somewhat to the idea of a creator or designer of all that exists. He has read Volney's "Ruins," Hume on "Miracles," Prof. Clodd's "Childhood of the World," "Childhood of Religion," and "Jesus of Nazareth," and is also familiar with the writings of Huxley and Tyndall. He is certainly beyond the most of his countrymen in free and independent thought in the anti-theological line. He readily acknowledges the baneful influence of priestcraft, and willingly discards the absurd theory of supernaturalism. I have much hope for this young man. He studied the law for four years, but concluded he preferred more active business, and is engaged in quarrying and sawing stone for pavements and building purposes, at which he is doing well. He has not taken a wife yet, deeming his first duty due to his mother and sisters, for whom he provides—his father, a teacher all his life, being far advanced in years and crippled by the loss of a leg.

I am able to report but little Freethought in Scotland. Presbyterianism obtained a strong foothold here, and it is intensely inimical to free and Liberal thought. When I meet a man with such surroundings who has the intelligence and courage to be independent it does me much good.

We had an hour at Perth. It is an old town of some thirty thousand inhabitants, but has no points worthy of notice. Three more hours' ride brought us to the old town of Edinburgh (always pronounced Edinboro), reaching here at eleven o'clock last night. By Mr. Esplin's advice, we came to the Waverly Hotel, conducted on the temperance principle, which is entirely congenial to our tastes. We find it a very comfortable stopping-place, and can recommend it to all who visit Edinburgh. I have always heard that this was a fine city, and have to admit the report correct, especially of the new town.

With its schools of learning, academies of art, and marts of industry, covering an area of some six miles in circuit, and including a population of two hundred thousand, Edinburgh, which is now a city of judgment halls and churches, and which was for centuries a paltry village of mean, straw-thatched huts, has made a wonderful change, especially within the last century. A kind of ravine, which was once a lake, but is now metamorphosed into most lovely gardens and pleasure grounds, separates the old and new towns, the western side being the old town, where its historical interest and incidents largely center. The new town is remarkably well built with tall, stately edifices, on wide streets, well paved, and everything is neat and tasteful. The city is built of a dark-gray freestone, obtained from a quarry four miles to the north. The stone is rather soft when first quarried, but hardens in the atmosphere, and makes very durable building material. It is a darker stone than Paris is built with, but in some respects the style of the buildings remind one of Paris, though the city is far less extensive. The buildings here are much taller than the average in London. I have counted buildings here seven, eight, and ten stories in hight. Five stories is perhaps the average.

The most we could do to-day was to view the public buildings, the monuments and statues, the streets, and some of the public gardens and grounds. The museums and galleries are closed on Sundays as securely as a prison. A more rigid observance is paid to Sunday here than in any other city of its size I ever visited. Its citizens are painfully religious. No street cars are run; no Sunday papers of any kind are sold; no shops of any kind are open. Everything is as blue here with Puritanic Presbyterianism as Connecticut was two hundred years ago. We being susceptible to that kind of influence, very naturally gravitated to church in the forenoon, and where were we more likely to go than to St. Giles's, the church in which John Knox preached some three hundred and thirty years ago? Here, in July, 1565, he delivered one of his boldest and most vehement harangues on the subject of Mary's marriage with Darnley, in which, with especial indignation, he denounced the nobles and other leaders of the congregation as betraying the cause of God by their inaction in the matter. "I see," said he, suddenly stretching out his arms as if he would leap from the pulpit and arrest the vision, "before me your beleaguered camp. I hear the tramp of horsemen as they charge you in the streets," and in a strain of lofty and sustained eloquence he denounced, exhorted, and warned his hearers with such vehemence, says Melvil, that "he was like to ding [dash] the pulpit in blads [splinters] and flee out of it." It was in this church on Sunday, April 3, 1603, that James VI. took his leave of the people to go to London to become James I. of England.

The church has had a long and varied history. First Catholic; after the Reformation it became the headquarters of Knox, and afterward was a regular church of England cathedral, but is now of the Free Church, or Presbyterian. Its architecture has also been modified and improved. We listened to a sermon of not over thirty minutes, wherein the preacher told us in what salvation consists—not in good deeds, not in morality, not in keeping the law, not in being a perfect worldly man, not in the outward forms of religion, but in a Christian life and character, and really by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. This is about the old story.

Presbyterianism is about the same in Scotland as in the United States. It matters not how upright a man may live, how much good he may do to his fellow-men, how conscientious he may be in the discharge of what he conceives to be his duty, it all passes for nothing, and is counted as filthy rags unless he professes the Christian creed and believes that a being may be his own father; that the son is just as old as his father; that three persons, when properly counted, make but one person, and that the father planned the death of the son for the sweet influence it would have upon himself.

Yes, according to this form of belief, a man has to accept Presbyterian theology or roast forever in hell. It is true or it is false. Reader, which is it?

The organ is a good one, and was well manipulated. About half a dozen hymns and psalms were sung, and nearly as many prayers were uttered. In this way the service was lengthened out to an hour and a half. When the money-bag was passed around from one to another, each one taking it in his hand and dropping in gold, silver, or copper, as he preferred, the organ gave its sweetest, mildest, and most heavenly strains, doubtless to induce the faithful to believe that while giving the coins of the realm to the Lord they were engaged in the most celestial employment they could find to do. I noticed nearly all dropped in something; and remembering that in Rome we must do as the Romans do, I also dropped in a coin, though I am quite sure it was neither gold nor silver. If the Lord can make copper available in his business, I prefer to contribute that kind of money to his treasury, and I think there are others with the same prejudices.

We visited the house where John Knox used to live. It looks extremely antique, with small windows, the panes of which are six inches square. It is in the old part of the town, where many of the houses look to be five hundred years old. We also visited the spot where Knox was buried, marked by a flat stone simply with "I. K." upon it, imbedded in the pavement. It is immediately in the rear of the church he used to preach in. Knox was a man of decided character. He had his good traits and some not so good. He was violent in his opposition to those who did not embrace the same religious views he did, and he pursued his opponents to the bitter end. He destroyed the churches and monasteries of the Catholics and with as much hatred and intolerance as though they had been the gates of hell. But he did a great thing for the free school system of Scotland, and may be regarded almost as its father. He was undoubtedly a man of stern integrity and firm devotion to what he believed to be right. He was also a man of the strongest prejudices, most relentless hatred, and of unyielding intolerance. Had his religion been of a milder and more genial character than that taught by John Calvin, or had he no religion at all, he would doubtless have had more humanity and have been a better man.

We were shown the house where David Hume resided when he lived in Edinburgh—a tall, old-looking stone house, reached by a narrow passage from High street, which used to be the street of Edinburgh, and is yet one of much importance. I felt that Hume was a better man than Knox, and reverently raised my hat as I stood at the door where he had thousands of times passed in and out. We were also shown the house in which Robert Burns lived when in Edinburgh. The window of his room was open, and three young persons were hanging out of it. Burns is highly revered by the people of this country, especially the poorer classes. He was not much of a friend to royalty, nobility, and the priesthood, and it is not strange that this trio should not think altogether well of Bobby. When I meet his statue, as I have done both here and in Glasgow, my hat raises spontaneously.

We visited the church of the Grey Friars, where the covenanters used to hold their meetings regularly, and where the covenant was signed. In the adjoining church-yard are the graves of many hundreds who for two or three centuries have been waiting for Gabriel to blow his trump, but which they have not yet heard. The inscriptions on the tombstones are many of them quaint and amusing, but I did not take the time to copy them.

We saw "the Heart of Mid Lothian," immortalized by Sir Walter Scott. It is a heart formed of brick in the pavement of High street. Not far away is the spot, marked by three stones, where the criminals were formerly executed. The blood of many a wretch was there shed. This is also on High street. On another street was pointed out to us the place where state prisoners had their heads taken off—those who had offended the ruling power in matters of government. The taking off the heads of dukes, counts, and even kings, was once very frequent here. We likewise saw the house where two persons in the course of eight months murdered forty men for the purpose of selling their bodies to the medical colleges for dissection, for this has for hundreds of years been a noted place for medical schools, and the young students must have bodies to work upon to learn how living bodies are organized. The unfortunate men, under various pleas, were induced to enter this house and to drink very freely until drunk. When prostrate upon the floor one of them placed his knees and his whole weight upon the wretch's breast, while the other held the man's nose with one hand and his mouth with the other, and in a few minutes it was all over with the poor fellow, without any marks of violence being made.

These bodies found a ready market from the medical professors, and no questions were asked as to how the bodies were obtained. Of course, they could not be ignorant of the fact that murders had probably been committed, and for their express benefit; but the necessity for "subjects" made them unmindful of the fact. This is by no means the only case where medical professors and teachers have paid the worst of criminals for committing the worst of crimes, that their classes might have bodies for dissection. How often have graves been robbed of the dear ones deposited therein, and the M.D.'s gladly rewarded the midnight grave-robber by paying him liberally for the bodies! And worse still, the blackest murders have been paid for in the same way and for the same purpose. In the cases referred to here, inconsequential and obscure persons were selected, but many were missed, and nothing could be heard in reference to them. Finally an idiotic person well known to everybody in Edinburgh was suddenly missed, and the inquiries were frequent as to what had become of him. The papers took the matter up, and had considerable to say of the sudden disappearance of this person, on the heels of so many others of a similar character. At last a medical student told a person that he had seen the body of this well-known idiotic person on the dissecting-table in the college. This led to a thorough examination, and the facts came out. One of the criminals turned king's evidence; the other was convicted and executed; but the guilty informer, and the almost equally guilty professors, went scot-free.

The slums of Edinburgh, where the low, dissolute, and worthless class live huddled together in close, dark, tall stone dungeons, are in the lowest part of the city, and their means of egress and ingress to and from the open street is by narrow, dark, and filthy passages unfit for the use of human beings. I looked into them enough to see that large numbers of low-down human beings dwell there in wretchedness and abject poverty as bad, I think, as I ever witnessed. What a mockery are gilded palaces and the glitter of royalty and fashion while tens of thousands of beings in human form are wallowing in the filth of misery and destitution! Why send thousands upon thousands of pounds and dollars to convert the so-called heathen of foreign lands, when at home there is ten times as much degradation, ten times as much suffering? I fear God takes but little interest in these miserable beings in the divine form in which he fashioned them after his own image, who are groveling out in wretchedness and squalor the unhappy existence into which he has thrust them. If he has the will equal to the power ascribed to him he might certainly do something to ameliorate the deplorable condition of these festering, reeking, dying thousands, in the great cities of the world, who are so unfortunate as to be his children. We are left to conclude that he lacks either the will or the power to do anything to benefit this portion of his family. The vast amount of human wretchedness that exists, without any apparent effort from on high to mitigate it, is an unanswerable argument against the existence in the universe of a kind and beneficent being who rules the affairs and marks out the destinies of men.—(Concluded next week.)

We print this week but a portion of Mr. Bennett's second letter. It was received too late for publication in all its interesting fulness. The remainder will appear next week, together, probably, with the whole of a third letter.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 50.

538. It is more than two years since I wrote part I. of "What I Don't Believe." Soon after writing the last installment I was brought to trial in the United States District Court, in the city in which I resided, for mailing a small pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," by E. H. Heywood, on the marriage question, many thousands of which were sold both before and since my trial, and which, as a book dealer, I had a perfect right to sell, it containing nothing but what any person can read with perfect impunity. But my Christian persecutors and prosecutors had prejudged me and decided in advance that I must go to prison, where they hoped I would die and my publishing business be broken up. The trial was a most unfair one, and the rulings of the modern Jefferies, Judge C. L. Benedict, were against me in every instance. I was not allowed to give the opinion of any writer, dealer, or expert as to the character of the pamphlet for which I was being tried. I was not permitted to show any comparisons between it and others sold in every book-store and found in every library. I was not permitted to show by the most competent judges that the little work is not obscene. I was not allowed to show that many other works, including the Bible, are obscene and much worse than Mr. Heywood's pamphlet. The most arbitrary decisions were constantly made against me, and it was very easy for my Christian judge to impress upon the Christian jury that I should go to prison. One of the jury was of a mind different from the rest, and he stood out for fifteen hours; but he finally got weak-kneed and complied with the wishes of his fellows and the judge. But you know all about this, and it is quite unnecessary to recount it here. I was sent to prison for thirteen months, which term I served out, save the abatement of two months for good behavior, according to the laws of our state.

An effort was made by my friends to obtain my pardon. Petitions were sent over the land, and these were signed by over two hundred thousand persons, asking the President to release me from prison. A petition with so many names was never before signed in favor of any person. But it was of no avail. A weak-backed man who was not elected to the chair which he filled was acting as President. He decided to open my prison doors, and so expressed himself to his private secretary and others; but the church said "No; keep that man in prison to the end of his term, even if he dies in consequence." The wife of the acting-President is a zealous church-member and a bigot, and she headed this demand. She contended with great persistency that I should not be pardoned. She spoke for the bishops and the priests of the country, and her voice was law. I was not pardoned.

My health at one time gave way, but I rallied and stood the confinement out to the end, when a glorious welcome and reception on the part of my friends awaited me. Never was greater honor bestowed upon a private individual, or even upon a conquering hero or a crowned monarch. Through such treatment the inconveniences of prison life were soon forgotten. I will state, however, that besides working two months at shoe-making while serving out my unjust sentence I wrote three large volumes, the first while waiting on the decision of the President in Ludlow-Street Jail, "From Behind the Bars," with eight hundred pages, and in the Albany Penitentiary two large octavo volumes, containing nineteen hnndred pages, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." The opportunity for writing these works perhaps made some amendment for the unjust deprivation from my family and business.

Soon after the expiration of my imprisonment, my friends sent me as a delegate to the International Congress of Freethinkers, held in Brussels, in the latter part of August, 1880. An absence of over three months was occupied in writing a series of letters home to my paper, and the satisfaction which those letters afforded my readers led to the plan of sending me around the world, to write it up, and to give my thoughts and the impressions made upon my mind while away. I am now upon the bosom of the Atlantic, on the steamer Ethiopia, of the Anchor line, bound for Glasgow, and it seems a fitting time for me to finish telling what I don't believe. I have not with me a record of what I have already given of what I cannot believe, and so if I should repeat in some instances what I have said before I don't believe it would be very strange.

539. Among the things I find it hard to believe, I will mention some that I have not before alluded to, while some that I have mentioned will again be alluded to. I cannot believe the Bible statement that the earth and all the other worlds were made less than six thousand years ago. There is abundance of proofs in the geological strata of our earth that it has existed for many millions of years and that man has existed upon it not less than one hundred thousand years and probably more than that.

540. I don't believe that the earth is older than the sun, though the Bible tells us that the earth was brought into existence and continued long enough for vegetation to come to perfection and bring forth trees, shrubbery, plants, with flowers, fruits, seeds, etc., before any sun was made. I cannot believe in anything so utterly impossible. As the light and warmth of the sun are of the utmost importance in the production of animal and vegetable life, it is impossible to conceive of a time when vegetation could be perfected on the earth when there was no sun. There can be little doubt that the age of the sun is as great as that of the earth. Morning and evening could not take place with no sun.

541. I cannot believe that if five days were required to make this comparatively small world, the sun, nearly a million miles in diameter, Jupiter, nearly 100,000 miles in diameter, Saturn, nearly as large, with countless other suns and worlds, many of them much larger than our sun and all the planets of its system combined, could have been made in the short space of one day. There is not the slightest possibility in such a statement.

542. I do not believe that the sun was created for the use alone of this little globe, while there are hundreds of other planets and asteroids revolving around it which equally receive its light and influence.

543. I don't believe that while the animals were being created, male and female, it did not occur to the creator that man should also be male and female, and that the plan that he should be so was an afterthought.

544. I don't believe that knowledge and life ever grew on trees any more than at the present time.

545. I don't believe that a snake was ever able to circu - vent and defeat the architect of the universe.

546. I don't believe the remarkable flood story. There are scores of falsehoods connected with it impossible for a sensible person to believe.

547. I don't believe that members of the human race at any time lived to the age of over nine hundred years. There is no probability of such a thing being true.

548. I don't believe Noah acted wise or godly when he got so intoxicated that he lay in stupor in his tent, exhibiting his person in a disgusting manner.

549. I don't believe that Lot and his daughters acted in a proper manner, or that the recital of such indecent stories are calculated to be of any benefit to readers.

550. I don't believe it was first-class morality in Abraham to trade off the charms of his wife for cattle, sheep, and gold, and to lie and say she was his sister.

551. I don't believe that Jacob was a truthful, honorable person, such as an all-wise and just being would choose to be the father of his chosen people.

552. I don't believe that the story of Moses and the Israelites in the land of Egypt is true. I elsewhere pointed out the many impossibilities in these statements, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

553. I don't believe that the Red Sea parted to let three million of the Israelites pass through, and then closed upon the Egyptians and overwhelmed them.

554. I don't believe that such a great number of people, with the cattle, etc., necessary for food and for sacrificial purposes, could exist for forty years in a dreary and sandy desert.

555. I don't believe that the land of Canaan was much of a gift to the Israelites when they had to fight like bloody pirates and kill off the legitimate owners and take what they had by brute force.

556. I don't believe now any more than before the remarkable yarn about Joshua stopping the sun and moon. It is too monstrous for belief.

557. I don't believe the Samson story, the Elijah story, the Elisha story, the Hezekiah story, the Josiah story, the Jonah story, the fiery furnace story, the Daniel and the lions story, and hundreds of others which I believe I have already mentioned. The whole compilation is a mass of improbabilities and impossibilities, without the least likelihood of being true. The stories were written by persons unknown to us, and even if we knew them well it would not make their statements true; and as they lived in an age when fable was persistently mixed up with statements of fact, and but little true and reliable history was written, but little confidence can be placed in the best of it.

558. I don't believe that many of the books composing the Bible were written by the persons whose names they bear. To begin with the first five books of Moses, it is not at all likely that he ever wrote a word of them. If he wrote them he selected events that took place a long time after his death, and mentioned cities that had no existence until he had been dead for hundreds of years. If Moses was able to describe his own death and burial, and to say that even unto this day his burial place is unknown, he possessed the most ability of any man who ever lived.

559. I don't believe that the book of Joshua was written by that bloody general, and for the same reason that the books of Moses were not written by Moses. The book of Joshua pretends to narrate events that did not transpire until long after his time. It speaks of the Jebusites and the Israelites dwelling together at Jerusalem, while that city was not taken till the time of David, several hundred years after the time of Joshua. The book clearly was not written till after the time of David. Such remarks as the following show that the account was not written till a long time after the occurrence of the events described: "And Joshua burned Ai and made it a heap forever, even a desolation unto this day;" and again, "He raised thereon a heap of stones, which remaineth even unto this day;" and still again: "And he laid great stones on the cave's mouth which remain unto this day." This style of expression clearly indicates that the account was not written till long after the events transpired, and of course could not have been written by Joshua. Who the book was written by no one knows.

THE vice-editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is at Hornellsville this week with a full stock of Liberal books to sell. He will also receive subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A Resolution Mr. Bradlaugh May Appreciate.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You will please be so kind as to publish the following at as early a date as possible, and send Mr. Bradlaugh a copy of your paper when published, a copy of which has been sent him in writing:

MR. CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M. P., LONDON, ENGLAND, Very Much Respected and Justly Honored Sir: Please accept the kind and heartfelt feelings of sympathy intended to be expressed in the accompanying resolution (which was offered by Mr. M. B. Laurance, and unanimously adopted), as the best manner in which we, American citizens, and Freethinkers of St. Johns Liberal League, No. 93, of St. Johns, Illinois, U. S. A., can express that deep and lasting regard which we entertain for you as a most noble agitator and defender of right against might. We fully commend the course pursued by you in your present and past troubles with those superstitious religious bigots, who should hav lived in the thirteenth century, if at all. In the sacred right you hold to a seat in the House of Commons, your words and actions in every instance hav been, to say the least, that of a noble man, while that of your assailants hav been everything but honorable and manly. We commend in the highest degree the untiring persistence of your noble, determined, and much-to-be-honored constituents in electing and re-electing you to fill a place in your nation's councils that no other man in England can fill with such perfection as yourself. You will, dear sir, believe us your sincere friends and sympathizers in all noble words and works for all time. MRS. M. V. HALL,

Sec'y St. Johns L. L. of Illinois, U. S. A.

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That we, the Liberal League of St. Johns, Illinois, U. S. A., No. 93, hav watched with intense interest the contest of might against right, and hav justified your prolonged endeavors to obtain the seat in the British Parliament to which you were legally elected, not once only, but the second time, an indorsement which, perhaps, no other member of Parliament, in the House of Commons, is at this time honored with; and we herewith, by resolution, tender to you our heartfelt sympathy, with the hope and belief that you will in the end come off more than conqueror. And we wish to record our unmitigated condemnation of those methods by which the majority in the House of Commons are attempting to subvert the rights of man. And we trust the time will come when not in England only, but in all the world, the expression of an honest opinion will not subject an individual to condemnation and punishment.

License.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I find much said of interest in your paper, and the question of prohibition, among other things, gets its portion of comments. E. C. Walker thinks education the direct road to reform; so do I. But how can you properly educate and at the same time license and set before your children that which you condemn? Mr. Walker says it is more than law can do. True it may be. Do our laws prohibit counterfeiting? And must we annul them because there is continued violation? I admire the man that in dead of night takes from my boy's pocket his money rather than the saloon-keeper, who takes money, morals, and debauches my son for life. I say remove the temptation, and then you show real protection.

I sometimes think the name "Liberal"—as in this question—is oftimes used to shield misdeeds. Why not license and defend houses of prostitution? And why not rear your children under their benign influences? I think it a poor way to educate by putting our young near such influences.

Prayer will not save mankind, but an enactment, a law, does make some seek to avoid its penalties; and we don't see that annulling any law would make any one more honest.

I wish some one would state to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers the evils prohibition would work.

I am, or wish to be, Liberal; but I am not ready to say that setting an evil such as licensed (or free) intoxicants before my boys is truly liberal or just. I prize liberty in its broadest sense to mankind; but because I am Liberal I won't giv the enemies of our race weapons for their defense. Truly yours,

Conrad, Iowa. A. FORD.

How Does the World Move? By Making One Folly Cure Another.

"All discord is harmony not understood,
All partial evil universal good."

How many partial evils did the achievement of American independence cost?

How many evils, of all sorts and sizes, did the abolition of slavery cost?

The boxing up of the autocrat is not without a purpose. A universal good is to be achieved.

John Sanford's master said to his ward, "John, I shall hav to giv you a licking."

John responded, "Lick away, but please remember that two can work at that business."

John wasn't licked. He had become a large boy.

The autocrat and other dread sovereigns are beginning to make the sublime discovery that the people are becoming a pretty good-sized boy.

The shooting of Garfield was rather a shabby business, but see how it harmonizes public feeling.

Dogmas, theological and political, don't hold the people in antagonism, as heretofore.

There are still other wrongs to be righted—follies to be cured.

We don't want them to shoot A. B. C.—the governor. PRENTISS.

Last Days in Rome (Ind.).

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: With Prof. Scott's oxy-hydrogen stereopticon apparatus to illustrate his able lectures on Rome; Prof. Seward's tonic sol fa system; Miss Ross's kindergarten; drawing by Frank Beard, a natural-born wit, whose wit seems to be not only consecrated but concentrated; classes in German, Greek, elocution; panorama; addresses by such learned gentlemen as Hon. T. H. Cooley, chief justice of the supreme court of Michigan; Dr. Henry S. Frieze, president of the University of Michigan; with lectures, sermons, visiting, boating, fishing, rambling, reading, hammock-swinging; with Prof. Case's hundred-voiced choir, the Constantine brass band—with all these the Christian Assembly was a great success; a success in management, a success in numbers, a success in finances. Some days there were ten thousand present, twenty-five cents admission.

Some of the lectures and sermons were superior, a few were old fogy and very musty. Even some of the best were marred by such expressions as

"Until scientists can agree among themselvs about the Yosemite Valley, and be sweet-tempered—until scientists, who are as positiv as theologians, can agree, we will not giv up our Bible to the demand of the scientists." [Applause.]

"The fault I find with astronomy is that it belittles our earth."

Thus it is, when they want to belittle science they do not hesitate to represent that it is in direct antagonism with their religion; but when they want to glorify Christianity then they seek the aid of science.

Rev. E. P. Dunlap discoursed on Siam. He was compelled to admit that the people of Siam hav good laws, and yet they are heathen.

"The Siamese hav comparativly a good code of laws. Their courts all seem to be entangled in a network of corruption. The judges of the higher courts grow to be the wealthiest men in the land. Courts are held in an open hall; judges sit cross-legged or recline on pillows or mats here and there through the hall; each one has his teapot and betel-nut box at his side, chews betel, smokes, and talks with those around him as though no responsibilities rested upon him."

Very like our own nation in most respects, not omitting the corruption; but the manner in which a Christian pharisee alludes to heathen iniquity indicates that his mind scarcely borders on the suspicion of any corruption in the courts of his own country—and the more Christian the court the greater the corruption.

Rev. Mr. Dunlap, returned missionary of the Presbyterian board, gave a sketch of the last Buddha:

"According to Buddhism there hav appeared on earth seven great Buddhas. The last and most celebrated was Gautama Buddha. Before he was born he underwent at least five hundred transmigrations, first a plant, then an ant, then a bird, then a heart, again as a heart, then as a slave, and thus born and reborn from the very lowest to the highest, suffering and enduring until at last he was born into a certain human, whence all Buddhas came down to earth. He selected as his parents an Indian king and queen, and flashes of light announced his birth into this world. At the age of seven he had such great wisdom that none of the learned men of the day could teach him, and was so strong that he threw a large elephant a long distance, and shot an arrow so deep into the dry ground that it brought forth a stream of water. Disgusted with all the vanities and pleasures of life, he deserted wife and family, and went about constantly preaching until his followers grew from a handful to thousands. He was clad in rags, and begged his food from house to house. Women flocked to hear him; but he laid a strict limit to their rights, and founded a doctrin yet held by Buddhists, that woman's highest aspiration should be to labor as a man."

"Deserted wife and children," like the apostles of Christ.

The "returned missionary" appeared to be afraid his Christian hearers would conclude that the miracles of Jesus were put in the shade, and so he assures them that Buddha's miracles did not amount to very much after all:

"He performed miracles, but they were of a low order, and compared with the loving miracles of our Lord were insignificant. No healing of the ribs, opening the eyes of the blind, or causing the lame to leap with joy, or calling the dead to life."

Now take the reverend gentleman at his own words. Is it "insignificant" to throw a white elephant a long distance? Compare it with his Judean savior's cursing a fig-tree! He confesses that "Buddha shot an arrow into the ground so deep that it brought forth a stream of water." Was that "insignificant?" Compare it with Christ turning water into wine for a lot of drunken fellows to drink.

Rev. Mr. Dunlap misrepresented still worse by saying Buddha did not heal the sick, restore sight to the blind, and make the lame leap with joy.

Those are rather reasonable miracles. The returned missionary must not flatter himself that Jesus was the only savior who professed to raise the dead. Chrishna, a very ancient savior, did it with the utmost ease.

The heathen can flay the Christian alive at every turn. The very small number of conversions to Christianity shows what a hopeless task the church has undertaken.

Rev. D.: "But he could sit cross-legged in mid-air, he could divide his body into innumerable parts, and from each portion would flash forth light. He could move though the air at will, could lengthen or shorten his stature many cubits. As the time of his death drew nigh he retired under a large tree, called in Siam the Bo-tree, and considered very sacred; offerings are made under it, and the Buddhist of Siam thinks that birds lodging in its branches are free from harm. (I made it a point to weaken their faith by shooting game from its sacred branches). Under this tree Buddha gave himself up to meditation until he lost himself in Nirvana, which is, according to the Buddhists of Siam, a state of unsusceptibility to all pain or pleasure—a dreamless, perpetual sleep. By the snuffing out of a candle his existence was ended. When Buddha's disciples wished to cremate his body they found that they could not burn it; but suddenly flames burst forth from his heart and reduced his body to ashes."

That surpasses the miracles of Jesus. Jesus, it is believed, could walk on water; but the Siamese savior could walk on air! Still ahead.

Rev. Dunlap represents the followers of Buddha as idolaters; but Sir John Bowring, in his "Kingdom and People of Siam" denies that they are idolaters. He says: "No Buddhist believes his image to be God, or anything more than an outward representaion of deity."

Zell, in his Encyclopedia, says, "This veneration of the memory of Buddha is, perhaps, hardly distinguishable among the ignorant from worship of him as a god." He further states that their religious exercises are commemorativ and do "not necessarily involve idolatry, any more than the garlands laid upon the tomb of a parent by a pious child." He might as well say that one who looks upon the photograph of a friend is an idolater.

It is a hard blow on the intelligence of Christian missionaries that they cannot distinguish the difference between reverence and idolatry, but most of them go to heathen countries with their minds already made up, and, full of zeal for their favorit savior, they see nothing but idolatry in the love of the heathen for such as Buddha, born of Maya, "Holy Virgin, Queen of Heaven."

The boy Buddha was far ahead of Jesus in sprightliness and intelligence. The first day he was born he stood up and said, "I will put an end to the sufferings and sorrows of the world."

As to his teachings, Dunckar, Max Müller, Klaproth, Laboulay, Prinsep, Hodgson, and others, who hav studied oriental literature, show that they hav never been excelled in moral precepts.

It is a well-known fact that Christian missionaries and boards hav tried to prevent the damaging facts of the excellency of heathen principles coming to the knowledge of the people.

By the best writers on oriental history, Buddha is spoken of as a "perfect pattern of all the excellencies he preaches; his self-abnegation, charity, meekness, do not falter for a moment."

Christians, who consider him to hav been the founder of a false religion, are obliged to confess that "his life is spotless;" "his personal example above reproach."

Prof. S. L. Baldwin was twenty years a missionary in China. There is not much hardship in living in the "Flowery Kingdom," not as hard as for a "celestial" to abide in California. China, with its mountains terraced from base to summit; vegetation, in some instances, to the very top; groves of camphor and oliv trees; orchards of pear, plum, and peach; thousands of acres of rice; tea plants on hill-sides—celestial land!

The people who by millions liv amid such scenes are, for the most part, a gentle, happy, contented, intelligent race. In the name of humanity, with as good a religion as can be found, what do they want with the selfish, unfair, one-sided Christianity of our day?

Was there ever a more bootless enterprise than Christian missions?

I am rejoiced that we Liberals hav had sense enough, and energy and pocket liberality enough, to send the veteran editor of The Truth Seeker to heathen lands, not as a missionary, but a close observer who will tell us the exact truth to the best of his ability. We will get a faithful picture of the heathen, in a plain, understandable shape.

Well, we must leave Island Park, with its sermons, lectures, calcium lights thrown across the waters of Sylvan Lake; while the barge, loaded with colored jubilee singers, white choir, and Constantine band discoursed melodiously. Music on the water, and at the witching hour of midnight, makes one feel heavenly. It is far more eloquent than zealot's plea and sectarist's hate against heathen and Infidel.

There, as we sat close by the lake, in the great tabernacle, open at its sides and end, we looked out on the waters, made golden by the setting sun—a gorgeous sunset, which no painter's pencil could equal—shooting toward the region of the receding comet the many-colored glories of the god of day. Such a display is enough to make us feel serene amid the petty thoughts of theologians about their Bible, God, creeds, and speculations.

One more disappointment, Anthony Comstock was advertised to be there. He did not come on the day announced, nor any other day, that I am aware of. Friends Hoyts, from Nottaway; Dexters, from Burr Oak, Mich.; Mrs. Brown and daughter, from Kendallville, Ind., were all present to see and hear the saintly Anthony. How lonely we felt without him!

An editor feebly tried to take his place, by alluding to obscene publications, but he broke down on that and switched off on paragraphs. The idea of an ordinary editor talking about pure literature! Laughable, is it not?

Seventeenthly. Permit me to observe, in conclusion, that these Christian assemblies are taking the place of the old-fashioned camp-meetings. They are far more respectable and are growing in wealth and influence. They combine the best features of the camp-meeting, on the one hand, and the best side of watering resorts on the other. There is Lakeside assembly, in Ottawa county, O.; Clear Lake Park Assembly, Clear Lake, Iowa; Round Lake Assembly, Round Lake, N. Y.; Ocean Grove Assembly, South Framington, Mass., Monterey (Cal.) Assembly, all of them born of Chautauqua. Their aim is to promote the study of the Bible and the instruction of Sunday-school teachers and leaders.

There is scarcely a state Liberal League that could not manage a scientific and Liberal assembly. It needs effort, backed by dollars and dimes, on the part of the Liberals. Will we be equal to our opportunities?

Atheism Triumphant.

A REPLY TO REV. MR. HALL, CAMPBELLITE.

"We are in deep water here—deep enough to drown Atheism," said the big-gun preacher of the Campbellites the other night, as he held forth from the pulpit, to the sea of eager upturned faces that appeared to be drinking in as law and gospel all that fell from his "inspired" lips. The sermon was a purely philosophical one, based on scientific facts and the perfect adaptation of means to the ends so apparently designed. And whenever some grand climax was reached and the nail driven in that clinched the design argument he would exultingly exclaim: "There, does that look like chance? No room for chance there!" etc. Just as if any sensible Atheist ever dreamed of a universe devoid of law and adaptation. Just as if it would not be all chance were a God who could be moved by prayers or wishes to take the helm and guide the course of events as whim or notion dictated. Gods make miracles, and miracles are chance work. A god sends his angels into fiery furnaces and lions' dens, and fire ceases to burn and wild beasts forbear to rend and tear. Whenever nature's laws are subverted by the will of a god then chance takes the place of law. But as this has never yet been done, we claim that no god has ever existed. You hav been trying to "drown Atheism" all through the ages of the past, but it is coming to the surface more and more every day. Each newly discovered fact in science or philosophy is a new timber in the structure of Materialism or Atheism, and one out of the crazy old hulk of the ship of Zion; and before you will hav succeeded in drowning Atheism you will find yourselvs submerged deeper in the waters of oblivion "than plummet ever sounded." You will sink deeper and deeper until the immense pressure will crush the life out of your god—your whale with his blanket of blubber two feet thick.

Atheism is simply naturalism, while godism or design is *super*naturalism, and in every contest of supernaturalism with science and naturalism, the former has always had to go to the wall. The Atheist maintains that everything in the universe is natural, and could not hav been otherwise than as it is, and consequently there can be no such thing as the unnatural or supernatural. No supernatural event or miracle has ever taken place nor ever can take place; and the existence of a God outside of and superior to or independent of nature is the most unnatural thing we can try to conceive of. God is but the expression of our ignorance of nature, and as fast as we discover and comprehend a fact or phenomenon of nature, that far God diminishes and recedes from the domain of the universe. We are profoundly ignorant of the first principles of almost everything, and to account for anything we cannot comprehend by attributing it to an imaginary god is childlike philosophy, and may satisfy idiots and infants, but the pabulum is too weak for the intellect of a Humboldt, Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, Tyndall, or indeed any mind that is not dwarfed and stunted by creeds and dogmas, and sects and faiths. To account for a mystery of nature by manufacturing another mystery a million times greater than our first mystery, and calling this manufactured myth a god, is the very hight of absurdity.

We are all natural Atheists. Every child is born an Atheist. All we know of gods is taught us by others who know no more of them than we do ourselvs.

"God is a spirit, veiled from human sight
In secret darkness of eternal night," and we can safely predict he will remain a sleeping mystery until the latest moment of eternity.

A finite mind can hav no conception of the infinit, and it is labor in vain, and time, money, and brains are worse than wasted when spent in trying to find out the "impossible to find," or comprehend the impossible to comprehend.

"How knowest thou aught of God.
Of his favor or his wrath?
Can the little fish tell what the lion thinks?
Or map out the eagle's path?

Can the finite the infinit reach?
Did the blind discover the stars?
Is the thought that I think a thought,
Or a throb of the brain in its bars?"

You giv no direct evidence of a deity, and indirect evidence is all negativ, and consequently no evidence at all. You put the cart before the horse all the time when you show by the harmony and adaptation of things to their surroundings that there must be a god behind the workings of nature to guide and direct them all, for this god would be more wonderfully made than all the rest, and would himself need a still more great and wonderful maker. So we call for direct evidence. We want just one direct proof that a god exists, and

When thou hast really found him
And shared "his precious love,"
Please take him down to Snowville
And thy assertions prove.

Then we'll grant one point made and one argument gained.

The telescopic and microscopic eye of your fish, the sail of the nautilus, the bony plate that protects the eye of the mud-diver, the shell of the lobster, etc., etc., hav all been accounted for by natural principles, while you attempt to rob the grand old universe of its beautiful inherent and unchangeable laws and giv all the good and glory to an imaginary being, and then personify him and worship him, thus doing humanity an unparalleled wrong and helping to keep up a delusion that acts as a brake upon the wheels of progress, civilization, and science.

No man, however good at heart he may be, or however good are his intentions, can do what is right unless he knows what is true.

Admit for a moment, for the sake of argument, that your theology is false—as we are forced to maintain it is—we would ask you, in the name of all that is science, how are the children and dupes of your flock ever going to find out its falsity? You will not allow them to even think, save as you teach them, nor to read a bit of Infidel philosophy under pain of hell and eternal damnation.

"Believe or be damned" is the first dogma of Christianity. This is the most infamous, the most execrable, doctrin that was ever promulgated by man or fiend. The clergy never settle anything. They are the great unsettlers of the world. This question of Atheism they hav dogmatized upon for ages. It is death to their gods and their work, and so they keep trying to "drown" it and settle it; but the more they work at it the more unsettled it becomes. Truth will out. The more the question is agitated the more science steps in, and at last she will settle it as effectually as she settled the rotundity and revolution of the earth.

The very fact that you labor so hard to prove the existence of your God is presumptiv evidence that you yourselvs doubt that he is. It is not satisfactory to your own minds, and you cannot therefore make it satisfactory to the minds of others.

If there was a god, every child would become conscious of his existence just as it does of the universe around it.

What would you think of a man who should deliver an apparently endless discourse founded upon carefully perverted facts to prove the existence of the universe?

If God has no better way of proving his existence to poor, finite mortals than to mock our efforts and stultify our understanding by manifesting himself in such mysterious "footprints" as the scales of a fish, the wing of a bird, or the hair of an animal, he certainly has a very "mysterious way his wonders to perform."

"Houses built upon the sand
By imagination's hand
Totter when the clouds of doubt
Pour their angry waters out—
Fall in ruins and destroy
All who dwell in folly's toy."

Iconoclasm.

This word is becoming invaluable in the vocabulary of the champions of the old reactionary doctrin, "Whatever is, is right." "He is an iconoclast," is the terrible sneer with which it is attempted to put down the upstart reformer who proposes to make some change in the ancient order of things in social or political life. We do not object to it. It is astonishing to what an extent any law or usage of the olden times becomes enshrined as a veritable idol in the imagination of a large class of men and women, so that he who has the temerity to propose a change, no matter how imperativly that change may be demanded in the interests of justice or truth or progress, becomes in their eyes a very smasher of sacred images. We hav reached a stage of progress when the social conditions are such as never before obtained in the history of the world. Education, science, intellectual freedom, hav done their work. The masses hav learned to think, to combine, to agitate. The great doctrin of the essential equality of all has taken hold upon the minds of men, and is being pushed in many quarters to unheard-of, and it may be illogical, extremes. Beneath the surface of modern society mighty and dangerous forces are at work, which threaten, unless suitable vent and scope are found for their healthful operation, to burst forth in dangerous upheavals and catastrophes.

It is remarkable what different effects are produced upon different classes of minds by the knowledge of this state of affairs. The difference is no doubt partially due to constitutional, but mainly to educational, causes. Those who hav been accustomed to the idea that certain privileges and prerogativs inherited from their ancestors, and sanctioned by hoary customs and traditions, must hav their foundations in natural right or divine ordinance lift up their hands in horror. They see no safety but in holding down the safety-valves. "Why, these fellows are becoming dangerous; they are positivly revolutionary. We must keep them down with a strong hand. If we giv them an inch they will take an ell," say they, and thus refuse to consider the claims of justice or to listen to the voice of reason. "Either they must take existing facts as they were, recognizing established rights as sacred, or giv rise to a social controversy which would not be able to be settled by peaceful means." So said Lord Lytton the other day in the House of Lords, and he but gave voice to the argument which lies deepest and is most powerful in the minds of the opponents of reform in Great Britain and elsewhere. We must do such men the credit to say that with many of them pure selfishness, the determination to hold fast what they hav in possession, without stopping to inquire whether it was justly acquired or can be rightly held, does not seem to be the actuating motiv so much as an unreasoning, slavish dread of what may be the result if they once begin to yield to popular clamor.

The views of the other class, the Liberals or Reformers, the "iconoclasts," were well expressed by the lord chancellor in the same debate—"The laws of property and the laws of tenure were made for mankind, not man for them." There spoke the true philosopher and the progressiv statesman. Change for the mere sake of change is of course undesirable and pernicious. But the fact that a thing is, is no proof in itself that it is right or that it ought to be. The fact that certain customs originated, certain distinctions emphasized, certain privileges seized and held, in darker days, in days when might was right, and the power of knowledge or of arms in the few sufficed to overawe and subjugate the many, often places the presumption on the other side, and makes it more than an even chance that what is is wrong. At any rate there can be no presumption in assuming that we of to-day are as capable of judging what is right and fair and desirable as our ancestors of one hundred or one thousand years ago. Hence we may boldly claim that it is ours to examin the foundations of old laws and customs, and reconstruct them when necessary on the basis of modern ideas. Nor is it either beneath the dignity of the statesman or dangerous to the peace of the state to hold conference with all classes, and to listen attentivly to what the peasant as well as the peer may think or say. The real danger is in striving any longer to ignore the voice of the many and to treat them as creatures made to labor, to obey, and to be governed or patronized.

Miracles.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been very much interested in your controversy with Mr. Mair, and think in your paper of April 2d you hav most effectually answered him in regard to the miracle business, and in this case the gray (mare) Mair is not the better horse. I had just finished reading Col. Ingersoll's lecture on the gods, in which he asks the church to perform one miracle, no matter how small, so it is beyond a doubt, and he will then believe in their God. The next day I picked up the National Free Press, published in Washington, D.C., in which I find that the church has actually performed a miracle. It is true it was performed in an out-of-the-way place, being an obscure town in Missouri. But Jesus did a good many of his miracles in obscure places.

However, the story goes that a young lady twenty-one years old had been sick for five years, and none of the doctors could do her any good. The Presbyterians were holding a protracted meeting in the place at the time, and came to the conclusion to try the efficacy of prayer in her behalf. So they fixed on an hour for all to join in supplicating their God to restore her to health, and before the hour had expired she arose from her bed, called for her clothes, and dressed herself, declaring she was healed, and has been going about ever since. She had not been out of bed for eighteen months previous to this.

And again, somewhere out near Erie a priest has been performing miracles by curing the sick, the lame, and the halt. They are coming from far and near to him, so he bids fair to rival our lady of Lourdes. And a lady in Vermont says she has been restored to health through prayer.

So you see, friend Bennett, the church can perform miracles. The Colonel, like Capt. Scott's coon, will hav to come down. Now, as the church had succeeded so well in curing the sick, I thought I would try it on in my case. I hav been suffering a great deal the last four months with rheumatic gout, and a few nights ago I had a very severe attack, and I was suffering terribly, could get no rest or sleep, and as I formerly belonged to the Presbyterian church, the account of these miracles came into my head. So I thought there would be no harm in my putting up a petition for relief in my case. So I prayed to the giver of all good, who the Bible says is so merciful, and who is more willing to giv good gifts to his children than any earthly parent is to giv unto his children. I told him in searching for the truth I had wandered from my first love, but I was sincere in seeking the truth; if the dogmas of the church were true, and he would instantly relieve me of my dreadful pain, and restore me to good health, that, like the prodigal son, I would return to my father's house. But, I am sorry to say, in my case the miracle business did not work. Now, I feel very certain that if one of my children had been suffering one-half as much as I was, and I could giv him relief so easily, I would hav done it instanter. And yet they tell us he is more merciful than we. I suppose the Christians would say my faith was not strong enough, and that reminds me of an incident in my boyhood days. I got my hand very badly burnt, and a neighbor told me to go to an old Dutch farmer and he would take the fire out. I had no faith in it, but was finally persuaded to go. Nearly the first word he said to me was, "Hav you faith dat I can do dis ting?" "Yes," said I, for I wanted him to try it. He then took my hand and blew on it three times, mumbling some words in Dutch, and said the pain will be gone in five minutes. But I must say it failed in this case also, all owing to my want of faith I suppose.

I am suffering one of the curses that this good and merciful God sends on his children even to the third and fourth generation, for I think my infirmity was entailed on me by some of my riotous ancestors, for I hav ever been strictly temperate, using neither rum nor tobacco, and am temperate in all things else.

Now I don't think in justice that I ought to be punished for others' sins, and this almighty Jehovah that has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but would that all should come unto him and liv, could in the twinkling of an eye hav restored me to health but did not. So I must continue to bear my pain till old mother nature (the only God I know) effects a cure or lays me to rest where the woodbine twineth.

"Hell" Still Doing Business.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Interpolations in "divine" documents, mistranslations, etc., and all that sort of things, are perhaps not out of place with zealous religionists, who frequently seem to consider that the end justifies the means. But I hold that we Freethinkers, Infidels, Iconoclasts, or whatever the pious world denominates us, should be particularly careful to avoid extravagant statements, incorrect citations, etc., in what we place before the public; and I wish here to correct a false notion, which I perceive has become very general, and which is repeated in Mr. Isaac Paden's letter regarding Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 20th.

Mr. Paden remarks, "The lake of fire and brimstone is now nearly annihilated, and hell is not found in the new translation." I take it that he means (as the press of this country has generally stated) that the word "hell" is not preserved in the new translation of the New Testament. This is a mistake, as I know by actual inspection, but, unfortunately, I hav not at this time a copy of the work at hand and cannot, therefore, cite texts. But suffice it that "hell" is several times still retained. In certain passages "hades" has been substituted for "hell," but not, as I understand it, as the translation of the same word, in the original, which is still rendered "hell.'

Letters from Friends.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I've sold my last "Darwins," and send the promised dollars for more. I told Mr. Bennett before he left that I'd do the little I could to keep money flowing into THE TRUTH SEEKER coffers while he was away. I hope to see hundreds of stars added to the galaxy of names, and that the list of subscribers will double ere our hero returns. I will do my level best to obtain all the names I can, for I am sure Bennett's letters from foreign lands will interest every one, and will make the paper doubly valuable to us all. Next week the letters will begin. Please circulate every paper. Do not let one be destroyed. Make all work for Bennett and the cause we love.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER., July 23, 1881.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find money order for three dollars for continuation of my paper. I am fully convinced of the judiciousness of the investment. I fervently wish that every Liberal on earth could be thoroughly impressed with the importance of sustaining all Liberal publications. It is a duty we cannot well absolve ourselvs from. Every one who subscribes for a Liberal paper signs a protest against the career of Comstock and the imprisonment of editors.

Respectfully yours, THOMAS BURK.

WHITEWATER, WIS., Aug. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which I wish you to send the paper for six months to a friend herein mentioned. He is a new convert, and is an honor to our cause. I suppose Bro. Bennett is over in Europe by this time. I hope he may hav a pleasant journey, and return to us safe and sound, bringing with him some evidence to overthrow Christian superstition and liberate the world from the tyrannical rule of hate and oppression, and make it a home of free, just, and intelligent people, instead of the prison of a set of ignorant, cringing slaves. By the way, what has become of "A Hater of Shams?" I hav been looking every week for something more from his pen. He is not used up yet by many odds, and it will take a great deal stronger artillery to do it than any that has yet been brought to bear upon him. Why don't he "get up and hit 'em again?"

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER a prosperous future, I remain, Fraternally yours, JENS K. STOCKLAND.

PERRINSVILLE, MICH., Aug. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to be able to send you again three dollars inclosed as a renewal for the very welcome TRUTH SEEKER before my subscription runs out. Experience has taught me the comfort I can take all the year round by paying in advance.

Yours most respectfully, WM. C. HERR.

HALIFAX, N. S., Aug. 22, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Herewith please find five dollars for Mr. Bennett's voyage round the world. I congratulate the gentleman on his success in establishing a Freethought journal in New York. The experiment has been tried in Toronto and in other Canadian cities with poor success, though to the last undertaking in Toronto writers like Mrs. Slenker, B. F. Underwood, and a host of others of recognized ability, contributed. The paper I publish, called the Mayflower, alone of all the Freethought journals in Canada, has survived the storm, this now being its twelfth year.

I would say to your readers that I hav just begun the publishing in the Mayflower (one dollar a year), from the original manuscript of a well-known French scholar, a work entitled, "Jesus and the Gospels," which I hav the only right to publish in North America. Thanks for your extract from our article on the late Dean Stanley in your August 20th TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, F. H. BAKER.

EDGERTON, OHIO, Aug. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As my subscription will expire soon I inclose one dollar to hav it continued, as I cannot think of doing without it. I hav read several Radical papers, but none of them compare with THE TRUTH SEEKER in common sense and masterly and philosophical arguments. Its editor, Mr. Bennett, is a profound thinker and writer, and a noble, grand, and educated man. I hav read with great interest his essay on "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind," and I think it clearly demonstrated to every thinking, inquiring mind the non-existence of any creativ or supernatural power outside the universe, and that matter is eternal, self-existent, and infinit, and that life and mind are the products of matter. I am sorry that I could not contribute $5 to the traveling fund, but I shall read his weekly letters with great interest, and you may put me down for the books as soon as they are published. Fraternally, A. J. SHAFER.

PLATTSMOUTH, NEB., July 28, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: The inclosed postal order for $5.00 please apply to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER to keep it alive. I can't do without it.

Yours for the cause, J. M. FOWLER.

JUSTIN, MICH., Aug. 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: All in good time I had my legal tender tenderly folded up with a letter which I had intended to send you, but the lank, lean, mythical monster, the wan wolf of want, hath done it—my letter was torn open and never reached its destination. The characteristics of the case lead me to suspect that said wolf has found the P. M. C. A. But I am O K now, and here is my "V." Love for universal mental liberty hath done it. The extra mite is for the best Liberal journal extant. I must not pat my own back, but I wish to remark the glorious response that has been made to a mere suggestion to send our beloved chief upon the noblest of errands. I hope my style will not jerk you out of your mental equilibrium. If it is handy, I wish you would go up into the "sides of the north" and saunter round and see what you can see. And then there is the "four corners of the earth," which would undoubtedly be interesting to us. In all probability said four corners are the identical site of the famous Satanical summer resort. Giv us a little description, and, if possible, get a picture of the devil as he goes dancing around the red-hot rim of his roaring hell. But I may be mistaken. I will leave the management of Mr. Mammon to the man who is doing more to lift the fallen millions of humanity from the mire of superstition and misery than all the theologians this side of eternity.

A Birdy Shuck prayer that you may return home safe and sound to an unbroken circle. May the gods stay their hands from meddling with thee in thy errand of mercy. Amen.

Agnostically and respectfully thine,

D. RUSSELL MARVIN.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., July 27, 1881.

ALEX. DOERLES.

COLFAX, WASH. T., July 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed postal order for $5 to help the globe-circling experiment. I havn't said anything about rendering you financial assistance, but I hav been determined from the first to put in my mite to help explode the old fabulous tradition of the holy of holies.

You hav my best wishes. I hope the good angels will attend your trip, and health and prosperity abide with you till your safe return to family and friends. Yours for the truth, J. M. HARPER.

ORANGEPORT, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: Inclosed please $1, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will renew before the expiration of term, and do what I can to procure new subscribers. Through the courtesy of my brother at Eaton Rapids, Mich., I hav read the paper and become quite interested in its contents. I also hav a strong desire to read Mr. Bennett's letters. I shall continue to circulate the papers among my orthodox friends. If there is anything that I can do to advance the cause of Freethought by circulating documents, etc., I am ready to enlist in the good cause. I sent Mr. Leland, last spring, a list of the most prominent Liberals in this vicinity.

I hope that Mr. Bennett and his paper will liv until religious ignorance, superstition, and bigotry shall hav been banished from the land, and truth, reason, and justice shall reign triumphant.

I hav fought religious bigotry, superstition, and intolerance for thirty years, alone and almost single-handed, hav suffered reproach, denunciation, and contumely, and hav been shunned, despised, and proscribed; but, thanks to the spirit of the age, I am now surrounded by many earnest, outspoken Liberals. I subscribe myself, Yours for truth,

M. E. ATWOOD, P.M.

ESCANABA, MICH., Aug. 17, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: Inclosed is $5 to help pay Mr. Bennett's trip around the world. I did not want him to go, but as he has gone I think the only thing I can do is to contribute toward his expenses, as he will need all that has been paid and more too. I hope he will hav a safe journey and return to us improved in health and strength,

Yours respectfully, J. N. HILLER.

SPOKANE, WASH. TER., July 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send postal order for $8—$3 to renew subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, from March, 1881, to March, 1882, and $5 to help you in your search after truth around the world; and I hope you may hav a pleasant journey, health, and prosperity, and truth garner for the millions.

Yours truly, A. HARR.

MAUSTON, WIS., Aug. 8, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: I received my paper and the show-bills this morning. The first thing I looked for was our dear old friend's departure from our beloved shores of America. May his health be good and his journey pleasant all around the world and home again. I see by his parting words those who send in orders for books will contribute to the prosperity of the business. Every book sold helps to meet the expenses of $250, a large sum, so I will send for six life-size lithographs and run my chances of selling five of them, and I hope thousands will do likewise. Also Bennett-Mair discussion when it is ready, and one dollar's worth of "The Adventures of Elder Trip tolemus Tub." For all the above-named find money-order for $5.50.

WM. HOLGATE.

FRIEND, NEB., June 2, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER you hav decided to make the trip around the world. I confess I preferred to hav you stay at home, where there was less danger, but as you hav decided on going I hav decided to send you $5 to help pay your way and make you more comfortable on your long journey. I see but few letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Nebraska although we certainly hav Liberals here. I wish you a safe journey and many years after your return. Yours, J. W. GILBERT.

ATLANTA, GA., July 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Find inclosed postal order for $5 to help pay your expenses around this little planet of ours. I did not send in my name, but my intention was to wait and see if you could make up the desired amount, and if you could another $5 would not be objectionable. That you will hav a safe, pleasant, and profitable journey is the sincere wish of your friend, MRS. H. S. DAVIS.

GREAT VALLEY, N. Y., Aug. 1, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I write you to send me one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, No. 30, as that number failed to come to hand week before last, and I don't want to miss any of the Bennett-Mair discussion. I hav read the closing debate, and were I a judge of the merits or demerits of the case I shouldn't hav to take any time to consult the minutes respecting evidence. Since the contest seems to be so unequal and there is such a preponderance of evidence on one side, it does not require a very keen critic or one of great comprehension to decide which of the two debaters won the belt, and by rights should be entitled to the laurels. And although we feel some reluctance in deciding against the man of God, yet the voice of justice speaking within us compels us to declare our humble opinion that you, Mr. Bennett, hav floored your antagonist, with all his gods and demi-gods, and even should they survive the fell attack there is little hope that all the gods and the devils combined can inspire Mr. Mair with sufficient courage to risk another encounter, or take the turf again to trot with D. M. Bennett, who, we all know, never breaks on the track and has made the best time on record.

I learn from my last paper that our old friend and editor, D. M. Bennett, was to hav started that morning at eight o'clock A.M. on his long trip, and is no doubt now far out on the raging main. May the winds be favorable, the waters smooth, the engins strong, and fuel plenty, that he may glide safely o'er the seas and so on around the circle back to friends and home. Such are the wishes not only of the writer of these few lines but also of hundreds and thousands all over this extensiv universe. I send my best regards to Mrs. Bennett and to all connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Truly yours, A. F. ALLBRIGHT.

MILL BROOK, CONN., Aug. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My motto is, "Don't forget to pay for your paper," so inclosed you will find $3.00 to renew my subscription to your paper. I can't do without it and I won't try to. It has come to be one of my household gods, and it will now be doubly dear, as those great letters are coming out in it,

Yours truly, H. W. PINNEY.

LOWELL, NEB., Aug. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I send by express two dollars, being one and a half for the paper until the end of the year, and the remaining fifty cents for a lithograph of Mr. Bennett, which please send to the above address. Please say if you hav a portrait of that noble man, Mr. Chas. Bradlaugh. If so I must surely hav one.

I am glad that Mr. Bennett has gone on his long trip, for I think he is the best writer that ever left these shores. But I do hope that he will not go any farther than China and Japan. I can see no use of his going from there to Australia, as it is a young country. He might as well go to Manitoba; he would see about as much. I think the time would be better spent in Europe and Asia. The accomodations for traveling are not so good, the steamers not so large, and the voyage very long.

I hav been reading some letters from England, written by Nasby. They came out in the Toledo Blade, but they seem poor things after reading Mr. Bennett's. If this Nasby only made a few mistakes I would overlook them, but his letters are budgets of trumpery and mean lies, thus it is nothing but a waste of time to read them. Such a fellow richly deserves pitching off London Bridge, and I would like to be the one to throw him off. It is very lucky for him that the London barmaids, whom he so foully slanders, don't know him, or I think he might fare worse than Marshal Maynaer did when he visited Barclay and Perkins' Brewery. My friend, who lent me the paper to read, said it was such a cheap paper. I told him the paper was certainly low, and the writing was of the same character, and therefore dear at any price. Some folks hav told me that THE TRUTH SEEKER is such a dear paper, but I tell them it is high-priced, not dear. It is cheap, for we get truth. Yours truly, G. GRAY.

BANGOR, ME., Aug. 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find one dollar in payment for your paper. I acknowledge I hav felt guilty every time I hav torn the wrapper off for the last three months, because it was not paid for. I never intend to owe for a paper again, and certainly not for one that I value as I do yours. To me it is the best paper in the world. You dare to speak the truth although you are imprisoned for it. I like your courage and your honesty. I should think they would get tired of trying to kill you after a while. They little realize that they are making new converts for you every day.

My best wishes go with you on your long journey, and may it prove a profitable as well as a pleasant one. Respectfully yours, MRS. S. E. GOULD.

LAKE VIEW, NEV., Aug. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me one of your show bills for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will volunteer to act as agent for that grand old journal in this and Ormsby counties. I think I am the only subscriber you hav in the two counties. If there is another you will please inform me, for I would like to make his acquaintance. There are many here of Liberal views who seem to be delighted with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I received that dollar's worth of T. B. Wakeman's pamphlets and sent them to our state officials. I hav seen the governor since, and asked him what he thought of it, and he seemed to be much interested in it. I told him I would send him a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He thanked me very kindly, and said he would like very much to see the paper.

I think I shall be able to get a number of subscribers before long.

Fraternally yours, J. S. MARTIN.

BELLEVILLE, KAN., July 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars and twenty cents, for which send "Six Lectures on Astronomy," by Proctor, and credit five dollars on the round-the-world fund to Robert J. Adams. I hope to get many names for the books. DR. H. PATRICK.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 20, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I hav had the dreadful misfortune (worse than any other calamity) to get into the trap of a perfect godlike, sanctified, Christian unconsciously and unawares. Therefore, very unwillingly but of absolute necessity, I must for the present withdraw my subscription for your journey round the globe. The uncertainty of the law is now my only hope and refuge from impending poverty and ruin. If I receive justice I shall yet be enabled to pay up my subscription hereafter. If not able to get out of this Christian trap, it may not be in my power to pay for books and the paper hereafter. I sincerely hope that my case will be a warning to all Freethinkers, Liberals, and truth seekers to avoid the intrigues of designing and faithless Christians!

Truly and heterodoxly yours, E. N. KINGSLEY.

RICHFORD, VT., Aug. 16, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: It seems to me that if man livs after he is dead in endless hell fire, he ought to hav positiv proof of the fact while he livs in this world. I will giv fifty dollars for good evidence to prove the following propositions are real facts: 1. That there is a real personal God, Elohim (aside from kingcraft, priestcraft, and hypocrisy), who created out of nothing all things in six days; created man, male and female, blessed and directed them and rested (Gen. i); 2. Then Yahweh Elohim (Gen. ii, 4) made it all in one day; made man of the ground; made a woman of one of man's ribs; planted a garden of fruit trees, and prohibited one tree (a perfect trap); 3. Bring me good evidence—not hearsay or assumption—that the eating of that forbidden tree by the first man and woman caused all children to be born sinners and exposed to endless punishment in fire and brimstone.

Either the Christian's Jewish God intended that man should eat of the forbidden fruit or he did not. God knew when he made man that he would eat it, or he did not. God knew when he made the prohibition that man would eat it, or he did not. Why did not God turn man out of the garden and place a cherubim and a flaming sword to prevent his eating? Either God could hav prevented man and would not, or could not if he would, or the story is a fabrication of lying priests.

What wicked man on earth would burn his children in fire and brimstone endlessly because they ate an apple that mystagog liars forbade? Yet we hire and pay millions to priests in the pulpit to affirm the absurdity. Therefore priestcraft and hypocrisy are really the rulers of this world.

After thirty years of sober thought and critical examination I hav found no good evidence that there is a real being in the universe such as is described by Jews and Christians or any other system of superstition. But the religion of humanity is the only true religion adapted to the human mental capacity; all others are priestcraft, hypocrisy, and imagination, and hav no real existence.

The Jewish holy scriptures affirm positivly that we shall not hav knowledge or consciousness after we are dead. Christians say we shall, but they hav nothing but hearsay evidence, thousands of years old, to prove it. And they hav murdered some five hundred millions in support of what they do not know is true, but hav overwhelming evidence that it is false. So wags our world in crime and misery.

Inclosed find post-office order for $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to January, 1882. I hav more Liberal books than I shall ever master. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER because I like it and admire D. M. Bennett. With my best wishes, Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH NOYES.

FAIRFIELD, PA., August 8, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: By the recent arbitrary expulsion of Bradlaugh, Parliament, in my opinion, clearly indicates that in its estimation Freethinkers hav no rights that professional Christians are bound to respect. Its treatment of that gentleman—and not only of him, but of his constituency—was certainly most high-handed and shameless. But the act will recoil; acts of injustice always do, sooner or later. Some persons—even some that are friendly to Bradlaugh—regret that he did not bear the injustice done him and his constituency with more meekness. I am not one of those. Human rights hav never yet been advanced by quiet submission to wrong. They, as a rule, hav been wrung by sheer force or fear from the grasp of tyrants. In my judgment, the behavior of Bradlaugh on the occasion of his second expulsion was, received in the light of all the facts in the case, perfectly excusable, if not entirely in all respects in good taste. "Something should be pardoned to the spirit of liberty," says Burke.

The English people I don't think will censure his conduct very severely. The provocation was certainly very great.

Well, they hav driven this robust apostle of civil and religious liberty by brute force from the House, but the end is not yet. We will now see of what stuff, moral and intellectual, his constituency is made; and not only his constituency, but the whole English people. The cry of "Wilkes and liberty!" will again be heard, the name of Bradlaugh being substituted for the name of that profligate patriot.

The House will yet find it convenient to recede. Their position is surely not tenable, either in law or reason—certainly not in reason. The fact is, they are afraid of Bradlaugh. He is the bugaboo of all the Conservativ forces. They are fully aware of his courage, tireless energy, bull-dog tenacity, and towering abilities. He would always be giving them trouble—forever bringing up forbidden and abhorrent questions. What with Irish discontents and multiform deviltries, colonial troubles, foreign wars and aggressions, and questions of labor and capital at home, John Bull, I should think, would hav had his hands sufficiently full without the introduction of this Bradlaugh business and all that it involves.

Did he not consent to take the oath—that meaningless formality. What decent excuse, then, hav they for refusing him a seat? None. I think English people will say so, and say so soon, or I am greatly mistaken. Who made Parliament the keeper of anybody's conscience? Is not such assumption on its part preposterous in the extreme?

A. O. SCOTT.

[From the National Republican.]

Gnosticism and Catholicism.

In Mr. Bray's first article he quoted a sentence written by the Emperor Adrian, in which he mentions Christ. I beg leave to submit the rest of the letter down to and including the sentence adduced by Mr. Bray. It was written in the year 134, and was addressed to his brother-in-law, Servianus:

"Egypt, which you commended to me, my dearest Servianus, I hav found to be wholly fickle and inconstant. The worshipers of Serapis are Christians, and those who call themselvs bishops of Christ are devoted to Serapis. There is here no ruler of a Jewish synagog, no Samaritan, no presbyter of the Christians, who is not either an astrologer, a soothsayer, or an anointer of the wrestlers. The very patriarch himself, should he come into Egypt, would be required by some to worship Serapis and by others Christ."

It appears, therefore, from the testimony of Adrian that Serapis and Christ were identical in Egypt A.D. 134. And this is corroborated by the fact recorded by the Christian historian Socrates (A.D. 412) that the cross was found engraved in the sacred temple of Serapis. In less than ten years after Adrian wrote that letter Marcion of Pontus came to Rome bringing Paul's epistles, ten in number, and a gospel which began thus: "In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Jesus came down (i.e., from heaven) to Capernaum (Luke iii, 9; iv, 31). At the same time Justin, of Samaria, proclaimed at Rome a Jesus born of a virgin in a cave, and he did not recognize Paul's writings nor Marcion's gospel. Marcion was the champion of Gnosticism, which recognized Jesus as a man only in appearance, who only seemed to suffer. Gnosticism existed before the Christian era, and was all-prevalent in the second century. In the year 146 the worship of Serapis was introduced into the city of Rome by Antoninus Pius. Meanwhile the belief in a real Jesus Christ began to prevail over Gnosticism, and at length Catholicism triumphed and became the state religion.

"J. B." denies that the synoptics, i. e., the first three gospels, describe the crucifixion as taking place on the great passover day, and appeals to the gospels to prove that it was on the day before the passover. The only proof he adduces from the synoptics is an equivocal passage in Matthew, which he erroneously interprets by John. John, I admit, describes the event as occurring on the day before the passover; but in this he flatly contradicts the synoptics.

Let us trace the order of events as described by Luke: "Then came the day of unleavened bread when the passover must be killed. And he sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat. . . . And when the hour was come he sat down and the twelve apostles with him, and he said unto them, With desire I hav desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer" (Luke xxii, 7, 8, 14, 15). That, therefore, was a passover supper, and it is also so described by Matthew and Luke.

At what time in the day was the passover eaten? "At even" (Ex. xii, 18). That evening, as every Jew will tell you, was the beginning of the Jewish day. "The evening and the morning were the first day" (Gen. i, 5); "From even to even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath" (Lev. xxiii, 32). So then Jesus and his disciples, who were Jews, celebrated the passover by a supper at evening; and before the close of that day, which began at evening, Jesus hung lifeless on the cross. It was the 14th and not the 15th of Nisan; the error in calling it the 15th arises from disregarding the Jewish division of time.

The day before the Sabbath, is call "the preparation" (Mark xv, 42; Luke xxiii, 54; Matt. xxvii, 62). Preparation for what? Mark and Luke say for the Sabbath, while Matthew does not say for what. But he tells us that on the day after the preparation the chief priests requested Pilate to guard well the sepulcher. That request was made on the Sabbath according to Matthew, and not on the passover day, which was already ended. John alone speaks of "the preparation of the passover." Why? Because he has Christ crucified on the day before. The supper which John describes is not a paschal meal, and he expressly says that it was eaten "before the feast of the passover" (xiii, 1, 2). John makes the passover and Sabbath come together; the synoptics do not.

Celsus, as reported by Origen, discredits the story of the massacre of the infants by Herod and of the resurrection of Jesus. He admits that Jesus went into Egypt, but says that he there hired himself out as a servant, and, having acquired some miraculous powers, he returned to his own country to practice them, and proclaimed himself a god (Origin agt. Celsus, i, 28). This agrees with the Talmud and not with the gospels. The Rev. S. Baring-Gould translates all that the Talmuds contain about Jesus, and admits that they do not refer to the Jesus of the gospels. He also believes that in the reign of Alexander Jannæus (106–79 B. C.) a certain Jesus went down into Egypt, where he learned magic, and that he returned to Judea and practiced it, but was arrested, and, by order of the Sanhedrim, stoned to death for sorcery.

This Jesus was the son of Stada, or Mary, and Pandiro, according to the Talmud, and of Mary and Joseph Pandera, according to the Toldoth Jeshu. Here, again, is a nearer agreement with the Jesus of Celsus, namely, an illegitimate son of a carpenter's wife by a soldier named Panthera (Ibid i, 32).

"T. B." asks for "a sample copy of a sermon on the mount." He will find it in the Toldoth Jeshu story (Revelations of Antichrist, p. 373). The parallel precepts purport to be given by Simon Kepha, a venerable rabbi, who became a disciple of Jesus about thirty years after his death by stoning and hanging. He lived six years on a tower, and, dying, was buried within it. "Afterward," continues the story, "they devised a most abominable fraud, and at this very time that tower is to be seen at Rome, and they call it Peter; that is, the name of a stone."

Kepha, in the language of the Jews, means "rock" or "stone." Kephas, the Greek form (Eng. Cephas), has no meaning; but Petros (Eng. Peter) is a translation, meaning "stone." Paul frequently mentions a fellow-apostle Kephas, whose name, in several instances, has been changed by transcribers to Petros, but in the Syriac version it is always Kepha. Having found that Paul lived as early as 63 B. C., and that he had a fellow-apostle Kepha, I infer that there is a grain of truth in this Toldoth Jeshu legend about Simon Kepha, of whom I find no historical trace in the first century.

"Dunbar" will please excuse me. I hav no taste for metaphysical questions. STUDENT.

THE price of "Antichrist," advertised by mistake as $1.00, is $2.00.

DURING the last few weeks many riotous demonstrations against the Jews hav taken place in the small cities of Pomerania and West Prussia, where houses hav been demolished and Jewish families persecuted by the mob. The Prussian government has now taken the necessary measures for protecting the Jews there, but a strong hatred against the Semitic race seems to pervade the whole population.

The Latter Law.

When, schooled to resignation, I had ceased
To yearn for my lost Eden; when I knew
No loving spirit brooded in the blue,
And none could see his coming in the East,
I looked for comfort in my creed; I sought
To draw all nature nearer; to replace
The sweet old myths, the tenderness, the grace
Of God's dead world of faith, and reverent thought.

Oh, joy! I found the stern new law reveal
Romance more rare than poesy creates.
Your blood, it said, is kindred with the sap
Which throbs within the cedar, and mayhap
In some dim wise the tree reciprocates,
Even as a dryad, all the love you feel!

You and the great glad earth are kith and kin:
There is one base, one scheme of life, one hope
On that and this side of the microscope.
All things now wholes hav parts of many been,
And all shall be. A disk of Homer's blood
May redden a daisy on an English lawn,
And what was Chaucer glimmer in the dawn
To-morrow o'er the plains where Ilion stood.

No jot is lost, or scorned, or disallowed;
One law reigns over all. Take you no care,
For while all beings change one life endures;
And a new cycle waits for you and yours
To melt away like streaks of morning cloud
Into the infinit azure of things that were.

And soon the selfish clinging unto sense,
The longing that this Me should never fail,
Loosed quivering hands, for oh! of what avail
Were such survival of intelligence
If all the great and good of days gone by—
Plato, Hypatia, Shakspere—had surceased,
Had mingled with the cloud, the plant, the beast,
And God were but a mythus of the sky?

And when I thought, o'ershadowed with strange awe,
How Christ was dead, had ceased in utter woe,
With that great cry, "Forsaken," on the cross;
I felt at first a sense of bitter loss,
And then grew passiv, saying, "Be it so!
'Tis one with Christ and Judas. 'Tis the law."

But when my child, my one girl babe, lay dead—
The blossom of me, my dream and my desire—
And unshed tears burned in my eyes like fire;
And when my wife subdued her sobs and said,
"O husband, do not grieve; be comforted;
She is with Christ." I laughed in my despair.
With Christ! O God! and where is Christ? and where
My poor dead babe? And where the countless dead?

The great glad earth, my kin, is glad as though
No child had ever died; the heaven of May
Leans like a laughing face above my grief.
Is she then lost forever? How shall I know?
O Christ, art thou still Christ? And shall I pray
For fulness of belief or unbelief?

The Gain.

NEW YORK, Aug. 18, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The inclosed lines, which are copied from the Evening Express of the 9th inst., the author's name not appearing, are worthy of wide circulation. I therefore send them to you as deserving a place in the poet's corner of your paper. B. SICKELS.

What is the gain?
If one should run a noble race,
And at the last with weary pace
Win to the goal, and find his years
A harvest-field of waste and tears,
Of turmoil and of buried trust,
Rich with dead hopes and bitter dust
And strife and fear and ceaseless pain,
What is the gain?

What is the gain?
When, having reached a sunlit hight
Through barren sweeps of gloomful night,
Hoping to see beyond the crest
Fair lands of beauty and of rest,
There lies before, stretched far away
Unto the confines of the day
A desolate and shadeless plain,
What is the gain?

What is the gain?
The race is won, we see the light,
We conquer where the storm-winds fight;
We show the way to those who wait
With faint hearts by the walls of fate;
Our banners flutter in the van
Of battles fought for thought and man,
And ignorance and darkness wane—
This is the gain.

Creeds.

Believe as I believe, no more, no less,
That I am right, and no one else, confess;
Feel as I feel, think only as I think;
Eat what I eat, and drink but what I drink;
Look as I look, do always as I do,
And then, and only then, I'll fellowship with you.

That I am right, and always right, I know,
Because my own convictions tell me so;
And to be right is simply this, to be Entirely and in all respects like me;
To deviate a hair's breadth, or begin
To question, doubt or hesitate, is sin.

I reverence the Bible, if it be
Translated first and then explained to me;
By churchly laws and customs I abide,
If they with my opinion coincide;
All creeds and doctrins I admit divine,
Excepting those which disagree with mine.

Let sink the drowning if he will not swim,
Upon the plank that I throw out to him,
Let starve the hungry if he will not eat
My kind and quantity of bread and meat;
Let freeze the naked if he will not be Clothed in such garments as are made for me.

'Twere better that the sick should die than liv,
Unless they take the medicine I giv;
'Twere better sinners perish than refuse
To be conformed to my peculiar views;
'Twere better that the world stand still than move
In any other way than that which I approve.

PLAGIARISM

Will be ready soon. A tract of sixteen pages, containing three articles yclept sermons, entitled,

1. Shame! Sham! Pshaw!
2. Dogs!
3. Cock-a-doodle-doo!

The first two of these appeared in the Seymour Times in reply to aspersions by William Emmette Coleman, and although he had been allowed four times the space I occupied, and a further reply was absolutely necessary on my part, yet was I refused a further hearing. In the last article or sermon, rejected by the Seymour Times, I prove beyond all doubt that W. E. Coleman plagiarized from my pamphlet "Sunday not the Sabbath" (48 pages, 1872), all that he quoted or summarized in his tract entitled "Sabbath Observance" (18 pages, 1879), from Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Victorinus Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Luther, Melancthon, Heylin, Milton, Baxter, Paley, and Neander; and that every reference made to the above authors, and every statement taken therefrom, was borrowed from my work. Other indubitable proofs of plagiarism will be given.

This tract will be sent gratis to every applicant by card or letter.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentives and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE,

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS are the marvel of the world.

They are dumbfounding the scientists and physicians, and making glad the hearts of the people.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE PHYSICIANS, CHEMISTS, AND ELECTRICIANS OF BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK

GENTLEMEN: A little over a year ago I arrived in the city of Brooklyn from Europe, and at 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, commenced the sale of my patented Magnetic clothing, advertised and known as the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I addressed a circular letter to a large number of medical men in Brooklyn, in which I fully described the nature of my invention, at the same time pointing out to them the rationale of my method of cure. A few members of the profession accepted my offer, and visited me for the purpose of having my invention fully explained to them. Of those who came there was not one but readily accepted my theory of disease, and recognized the possibilities of cure by my method, but a number of those written to so forgot themselvs and their character of gentlemen as to openly insult me by the return of my letters and in other ways openly expressed their bitterness of thought by designating me a CHARLATAN and a fraud. This line of conduct impelled me to open warfare against the now univefsal system of DRUG TREATMENT; but knowing as I do that there are many noble men in the profession who are ever ready to examin and accept that which is really beneficial and efficacious, no matter from what source it may come. With this fact before me, I am constrained to call upon the faculty of Brooklyn and New York, and respectfully invite them to visit my Manufactory and Consulting Rooms, when I will explain fully everything connected with my method of treatment. I will giv them the names and addresses in Brooklyn and New York of hundreds of its best citizens, who hav under my system recovered from every form of malady known to Nosologists, and this without a single dose of medicin. I am, moreover, prepared to take a patient from every physician in Brooklyn that he has given over as an incurable case, and place upon such patients to the number of FIVE HUNDRED, a suit of my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, free of charge, and will undertake to cure ninety per cent of all those handed over to me, within twelve months from the time of putting on my GARMENTS, my only condition being that PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT bind themselvs not to giv or use medicin of any kind. I will sign bonds for five thousand dollars, to be given by any institution named, should I in the twelve months fail to cure ninety per cent of all their incurables under their several systems. I will also at once hand over $5,000 worth of my appliances to any hospital, free of charge, to be placed upon the sick poor in such institution, bonds to be given in this case also, that medicin will not be given in any way

This is a standing offer for twelve months from date.

The following physicians may be referred to as having witnessed the effects of my GARMENTS:

Prof. CARMICHAEL,	Dr. ELTINGE,
FORDES BARKER,	Dr. THAYER,
Dr. DEMEREST,	Dr. TINKER,
Dr. CLARK,	Dr. TRUE.

The following gentlemen can also be referred to: Commissioner Garrison, J. B. Hoyt, Spruce street; Col. Bayard Clark, Judge Levi Parsons, E. Sinclair Clark, Lafayette avenue; J. W. Littlefield, artist; Mr. Frazer, corner of Reid avenue and Broadway. These, with thousands of others, hav worn my garments. Therefore, gentlemen, in conclusion I most respectfully submit that you owe a duty to yourselvs and the public to inquire into the nature of the invention thus presented to you. Bnt knowing, as I do, that all new remedies for the cure of disease should be well attested scientifically by practicing physicians before being generally prescribed, I herewith offer you every facility for testing the same, and would respectfully call your attention to a portion of Professor Parson's lecture, published in Baltimore this week. You will therein see the necessity for your inquiry as to the position that magnetism is destined to take among the REMEDIAL AGENCIES now prescribed through your colleges. Hoping that you will seriously and in a fair spirit inquire into the nature of my invention, I remain,

Very respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

READ THE FOLLOWING PORTION OF A LECTURE. BY PROFESSOR PARSONS, AND SAY HOW MUCH LONGER CAN THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN RESIST THE INQUIRY WHICH THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM DEMANDS.

MORE LIGHT.

THE HARMONY OF THE SPHERES.

DISCOVERY OF THE UNIVERSAL PREVALENCE

OF A PRINCIPLE THAT GRANDLY MANIFESTS THE WISDOM AND GOODNESS

OF ALMIGHTY GOD.

Professor W. H. Parsons, a talented and modest gentleman, who is now a resident of our city, has made a discovery that is likely to be regarded with the deepest interest by men of science everywhere, since it not only explains much heretofore mysterious in astronomical science, but is calculated to impress all minds with more profound admiration for the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God.

This discovery is that the sublime principle of MAGNETIC REPULSION is coextensiv with MAGNETIC ATTRACTION throughout our universe. This magnetic repulsion has equal potency with Newton's law of the ATTRACTION OF GRAVITATION in regulating the movements of all celestial bodies and maintaiuing harmony among them all. This principle was first developed in the course of manifestations and experiments of Professor Parsons, who is an electro-therapeutist, or medical electrician, while making researches into the relations of electro-magnetism to animal life, disease, and death.

Without attempting to trace how far previous advances of science had prepared the way for the grand discovery by Professor Parsons to which we desire to call attention, we may interest our readers by glancing at the great facts in magnetic philosophy.

Magnetism and electricity—the one the manifestation of the other, with different forms of motion; the one vibratory, as light and heat; the other spiral, as demonstrated by the induction balance, each convolution possessed with magnetic poles—are neither imponderable fluids nor atomic streams, but forces known only from results, the direction of the individual force in each molecule of all magnets, whether in the blood or the heavens, being the opposit of the force in its vicinity, giving rise to a magnetic force, says Maxwell, of extreme complexity, but which, by its repellant as well as its attractiv power, works order out of apparent and really original chaos, and under law established at creation's dawn is the principle of all motion and all life in every kingdom of nature, either in the heavens above or the earth beneath.

Perfect polarization, whereby like poles repel and unlike attract and neutralize each other, whether in the celestial system, including our own planet, or the circulatory system of the blood and nerves, of what is as fearfully, wonderfully, and as curiously made—the divine organism of man—is the source and law [it is not attraction of gravitation, affirmed by Newton, or the undefined centripetal and centrifugal forces of scientists], but the omnipotent and omnipresent governing force which maintains all motion, all life, all health, and all harmony in the cosmogony of the universe.

The law (attraction and repulsion) in each molecular current, or rings of electricity, in either the circular corpuscles which float in arterial or venous blood, or the circular orbs which float in the firmament of the heavens, is the now manifest and realized omnipresent and omnipotent attribute of nature and nature's god by which worlds and all celestial bodies, including comets, are sustained in space without possibility of collision, and all motion, whether orbital or axital, has become the harmony of the spheres.

Its disturbance in the one is the source of all commotion, celestial (as solar magnetic storms) or terrestrial, inward, as in the magnetic shocks of the earthquake, or outward, in electric storms by land or sea. Its interruption in the animal organism whereby the ultimate electric molecules of the blood, tissues, nerves, and muscles, each with a positiv and negativ pole (recently discovered and announced to exist by Shettle Scoutellon, of Paris, and Dubois Reymond), become non-electric or demagnetized, in which non-electric state, says Reymond, these molecules are turned toward each other with like poles so that two become one, possessed of one positive zone and two negativ poles, and when in the electrotonic state unequal or unlike poles are turned toward each other. This non-electric or demagnetized state of the iron molecules of the blood, or the electric molecules of the nerves and muscles is, therefore, the source of all disorder and all diseases in the human cosmos.

I may be, and we believe it is, the law that the celestial strangers known as comets are magnetic regulators designed to resupply the wasted magnetic forces of the spheres they traverse in space, creating apparent temporary disturbance and increased activity in the magnetic forces of the sun, plainly visible in the solar spectrum, and due, says Lockyear, in a recent lecture before the Royal Astronomical Society, to the ejection of heated matter in the interior of the sun, the result of increased temperature and consequent breaking up of magnetic iron in the sun into simpler constituents.

Whatever weight is due to this theory of magnetic restoration of exhausted planets—illustrated in the increased temperature of the sun thus excited by the positiv forces of its late and still freshly announced celestial visitors—it has been demonstrated that the electro magnetic or nervo electric vital forces of the human organism can be uniformly replenished and resupplied and reinvigorated and revitalized from the very verge of dissolution and partial demagnetization of the ultimate electric molecules of blood and nerve by the truthful application of the maxim of the great German Esculapins, that like cures like, with the universal law of proper polarization, celestial and terrestrial, revealed and understood, man may and will control its forces; unlock the arcans of nature in all her kingdoms; stand within the veil face to face with the magnetic source of nniversal life and motion; and the preventiv of decay and premature death approach to comprehend with a spirit of exultation and awe the now revealed, yet still invisible, power, which, when darkness was upon the face of the deep and chaos reigned, moved upon the face of the waters, uttered the supreme fiat, and solar magnetism burst upon a primeval world, bathed it in light, and then as now, invested it with life and clad it in beauty.

THE "WILSONIA."

The "Wilsonia" will cure every form of disease that is curable without medicin of any kind, change of diet or occupation. Magnetism is all that is needed when any portion of the human organism is deranged. It is by the forces of magnetism that the stars are kept in their orbits, and the heavenly bodies bear witness to God's omniscience in his first grand conception of so simple a method as the polarization of ultimate atoms, whereby the repellant and attractiv forces thus inhering keep constant and in order all vegetable, animal, and mineral life, there being even in minerals ample evidence of life forces, although to our senses they may appear dead.

The forces of cohesion in mineral and seriform bodies are but modifications of the same magnetic law, and the disintegration and breaking up of the atoms forming the mass is only another form of death; actual death cannot be; all is changed; nothing ever dies; its form is alone altered. Disease, therefore, is nothing more than an alteration of polarities, whereby the organism is disarranged. If, therefore, we can by any means keep the peculiar polarities of our organic structure in perfect unison, then disease cannot be; and knowing as we do that the blood is the regulator of our being by virtue of its circulation, such circulation being animated by electric nerve fluids keeping in constant magnetic condition the atoms of iron in the blood; but when nature be impaired or exhausted, then any perfect artificial magnetization will restore the diseased organism, no matter what name may hav been given to the malady.

THE "WILSONIA"

Magnetic Garments are nature's true remedy for every ill, and there is not in the world such testimony as can be found here, in Brooklyn and New York, as to the wonderful yet simple treatment of disease.

The "WILSONIA" will cure any of the following forms of disease:

Paralysis,
Inflammatory Rheumatism,
Anchylasis,
Asthma,
Bronchitis,
Inflammation of the Lungs
Heart Disease,
Albuminous Urine,
Locomotor Ataxia,
Gout,
Varicose Veins,
Catarrh,
Pneumonia,
Bleeding at the Lungs,
Congestion of the Kidneys,
Spinal Disease.

Evidence of this we can giv from the experience of over THIRTY THOUSAND persons.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been snreptitiously issned are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

"Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

"The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

THE pietist says, "Those who are resigned to the will of God—are capable of always living in obedience and happiness and living at peace with God and all his people—are Christians." Resigned to the will of God. And the Bible is the will or testament—the whole Bible—all editions and revisions of the Bible—all translations of the Bible. Ear-marks so numerous and so inscrutable that I despair of finding them! Does anything ever happen contrary to God's will? Is it his will that I should teach Infidelity? Is it his will that so many lead lives of sin, vice, ignorance, and crime? Is it his will that all should be precisely as it is?—Elmina D. Slenker.

A RELIGIOUS faith that dreads unfettered investigation and a trial by logic or science is already feeble and in decay. It will not answer for oldish men and woman, educated in another and a better school, to criticise sharply and censoriously those who are striving to meet the wants of the new generation. What shocks them is often what feeds others. Men who do not read, study, and think are poor judges of the work of those who do. It is safe enough to assume that those who administer religion a half century behind the times, in respect of learning and the best thinking, will find plenty of people who like it and who will pronounce it the most pious and wholesome way. But the timid and satisfied and unprogressiv—though often the most fastidious, the most ceremonious, and the most proper—are seldom the representativs—as they are seldom the constituents—of the deepest thought on the most efficient feeling in religious things.—Rev. H. W. Bellows.

LET me tell you the story of Orpheus and Eurydice. Eurydice had been carried away by the god of hell, and Orpheus, her lover or husband, went in quest of her. He took his lyre with him and played such exquisit music that all hell was amazed. Ixion forgot his labor at the wheel, the daughters of Danaus ceased from their hopeless task; Tantalus forgot his thirst, even Plato smiled, and, for the first time in the history of hell, the eyes of the furious were wet with tears. As it was with the lyre of Orpheus, so it is to-day with the harmonies of science, which are rescuing from the prisons of superstition the torn and bleeding heart of man.—Ingersoll's Hell.

IT was not until the time of Descartes that people began to consider the problem of consciousness in any sort of intelligent way. Of course, we know that it is an entirely wrong thing to say that the physical counterpart of being angry was the boiling up of the blood about the heart. It was a mistake that the ancients made that the motions in and about the heart were connected with the emotions and the passions, and that has run into unpopular language. We speak of a person being good-hearted or bad-hearted, and so on, but that, as you know, is an entire mistake.—Clifford's Seeing and Thinking.

A BODY heavier than the atmosphere, unsupported, falls to the ground. This action is regular, invariable, uniform. We say it is the law of gravitation. It was not made, instituted, or impressed on matter unless matter itself was made. We cannot imagin matter existing without modes of action or uniform sequences of motion. We say they are co-eternal with matter and "a stringent expression of necessity." All forms come into existence and undergo disintegration in accordance with them. The combustion of coal in the furnace of a locomotiv and the eruption of a volcano; the zephyr that fans the cheek on a summer's day and the tornado that sends a fleet laden with humanity beneath the remorseless waves; the rounding of a pebble and the formation of a world; the motion of a feather in the air and the majestic march of a planet through space; the folding of a sensitiv plant's leaf, the movements of a zoophyte, and the thoughts of man, are all equally subject to invariable laws.—Underwood's Christianity and Materialism.

WHILE the varieties of reading in the New Testament were reckoned at about thirty thousand in the last century, they are generally referred to as amounting to no less than one hundred and fifty thousand at the present day.—Dr. A. Roberts.

DON'T pluck from the heart the sweetest flowers of piety and crush them by superstition. Do not believe that God ever ordered the murder of innocent women and helpless babes. Do not let this supposition turn your hearts into stone. When anything is said to hav been written by the most merciful God, and the thing is not merciful, then I deny it and say he never wrote it. I will liv by the standard of reason; and if thinking in accordance with reason takes me to perdition, then I will go to hell [even if it be Gehenna and not merely hades] with my reason rather than to heaven [Abraham's bosom] without my reason.—Ingersoll.

I COUNT the number of human beings in civilized society who are unable to liv moral lives so small as not to be worthy of estimation. The inner emptiness of life does not come from man's inability, but from his brother's inhumanity. The divine hand has made no mistake in our creation, but the human hand has marred the creator's work. Instead of saying to the unfortunate, "May God hav mercy on your soul!" let us say, "May man hav compassion on your misfortunes!"—L. K. Washburn.

MANY and sharp the numerous ills
Inwoven in our frame,
More pointed still we make ourselvs
Regret, remorse, and shame.
And man whose heaven-created face
The smiles of love adorn,
Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn.
—Burns.

REST! Rest! Oh, giv me rest and peace!
The thought of life that ne'er shall cease
Has something in it like despair—
A weight I am too weak to bear!
Sweeter to this afflicted breast
The thought of never-ending rest!
Sweeter the undisturbed and deep
Tranquillity of endless sleep!
—Longfellow's Golden Legend.

Odds and Ends.

WAGONS are born tired.

GOES by water—a toper.

A COUNTERSIGN—"No trust here."

A MAN'S heirs are sometimes his most impatient creditors.

JUMPING at a conclusion—A dog trying to catch his own tail.

A BLACKSMITH is always on the strike—when he is not blowing.

THE corkscrew finds the longest way round the safest way through the cork.

A WESTERN editor wrote an article on Rhubarb, and the compositor made pi of it.

THE reporter who was requested to write up the death of two murderers, said he'd see 'em hanged first.

WE hav heard considerable about the habit girls hav of sitting on one leg. It's a very bad one, particularly if the leg does not belong to the young lady.

WILL the coming man use both hands? is a question asked by a scientific exchange. We do not see how the coming man can use both hands unless the coming woman drives the horse.

AT a Woman's Rights meeting in this city the other day a lady from Chicago said she would "try to cover all the ground;" a St. Louis lady remarked that she "thought she could do it."

NICE AN' YACHTY.

A captain who owned a nice yacht
Sailed away to a beautiful spacht;
The harder it blew,
The warmer it grew,
"By St. Andrew," said he, "but it's hacht!"

A sailor of splendid physique,
He was fearless and gay, so to spique;
So he would not rare,
And "holler" and swear,
Though the yacht that he loved sprung alique.

With his passengers from the "Argyll,"
He cruised about seventeen myll;
And then when they bought
All the fish they had caught,
Said Herbert, "Well, now, I should smyll."
—Hawkeye.

THAT FLY.

He sat down upon a recent Sunday morning for a quiet hour with his newspaper. Presently a fly, socially inclined, began to forage upon his bald spot. He put up his hand; the fly described a graceful curve in the air and came down upon his ear. He cuffed his ear, and the fly darted around and perched upon his nose. He then put his hand to his nose six times in succession, and the fly shot into the air each time, and returned at exactly the same angle. Wild with vexation, he waved his paper in the air and muttered,

"If I were in the habit of swearing I should say, Cuss these little pests!"

Then an inspiration seized him; he yanked off his slipper, and said to his seven-year-old son:

"Here, boy, take this and go for these flies, and make mummy-meat of every one of them!"

"Shall I hit 'em on the wall?"

"Yes, hit 'em on the wall."

"Shall I hit 'em on the table?"

"Yes, hit 'em on the wall; hit 'em on the table; hit 'em anywhere; only be sure that you mash 'em!"

The lad was a dead shot, and entered upon the work with a relish. Nearly every stroke marked the demise of one of the hated pests. But after a little there was silence for a space, and then suddenly a resounding whack.

The outraged parent clapped his hand to his head, leaped to his feet, and shouted in high G, as he drew the slimy remains of a mangled fly from his glossy pate,

"Hi, there! you little heathen; what do you mean by hitting me on the head in that shape?"

"O pap!" cried the boy, with enthusiasm; "it was a whooping great blue-bottle!"

"Blue-bottle—well, I'll blue-bottle you if you hit me on the head again—you hear me!"

And with clouded brow he resumed his reading, while he gently stroked the swelling bump of self-esteem.

THE KANSAS MAN.

One sweltering day in hot July
A beer saloon he wandered by,

And seeing that he was not seen,
He entered at the swinging screen,

And to rebuke the drunken men
Whom he observed around him then,

He ordered, as he knew he'd ought ter,
A glass of pure, clear crystal water.

He set it down; "Ah, ah!" said he,
"Cold water is the drink for me."

And so to make it cold and nice
He pounded in a little ice.

Healthful and good, sliced very thin,
He dropped a little lemon in.

And then he said, "Sweets to the sweet,"
And stirred some sugar in the treat.

To kind of brace the mixture up
He dashed some bitters in the cup;

Then just a lee-tle whisky—well
Say twenty lines of nonpareil.

And while he stirred it with a spoon
He sang in gleeful tones this tune,

"Water, cold water, pure and free,
Water is the drink for me."

He raised his head; loud, loud he laughed,
And to the dregs the goblet quaffed.

"This is the new amendment plan,"
Remarked the temperance Kansas man.

Then set his course and held that day,
Due west his calm, imperial way.

Notes and Clippings.

NEW ZEALAND has a $50 poll tax on Chinese, and New South Wales is going to imitate her.

"THE truth is," as seen by the Retailer, a journal devoted to alcohol, "that the world never drank so moderately or judiciously of all beverages as at present.

THE name is lacking in this Western item of news: "An eminent judge of Indiana, now indulging in his annual debauch, has broken a faro bank at the Hoosier capital."

THE falling off in Peter's pence, which has excessivly crippled the pope, is asserted to be due to the concerted action of the Jesuits, who are strongly opposed to his ideas and policy.

THE project of a second Suez canal under English auspices is the subject of discussion in the Alexandria press. The advantages proposed include a quicker transit and a reduced tariff.

THE Record (Evangelical) takes pleasure in contradicting a rumor that the Prince of Wales "had played at lawn tennis on the Lord's day," and the evangelical party once more breathe freely.

A MASQUERADE ball was one of the events of the Spiritualist camp-meeting at Lake Pleasant, Mass., and it was believed that a number of the masked and fancifully-costumed dancers were materialized spirits.

A SEXTON and his enemy fought in a churchyard at Millsboro, Del., and the sexton was thrown into a freshly-dug grave. Then the other undertook to bury him alive, and had almost completed the job when help came.

THE pope's nephew lately applied to him for assistance to marry. The pope borrowed $5,000 and gave it him. Soon after, he made over to his family some $15,000. the whole of his small patrimony. What a contrast to papal nepotism in other days!

THE Dreamers are a new Minnesota sect, who believe that dreams are revelations of divinity, and only need correct interpretation to serve as guides to holy living. Their leader professes peculiar expertness in this regard, and his followers report all their dreams to him to be interpreted.

THE following has been sent to the papers for publication: "Americans and friends of Ireland are hereby warned against embarking upon any vessel flying the British flag after Thursday, September 1st. Many may reach their destination, but none are safe. By order of the Central Committee, Chicago, August 27, 1881."

BRO. KNOWIDEN'S polygamy is of a kind that even Mormons do not approve. He has a wife in each of seven Utah towns, so that in his travels he is provided with convenient lodgings free of cost, for he lets the wives support themselvs. One of them became so poor that she nearly starved to death, and Knowiden was mobbed next time he visited her.

LETTERS from Russia depict a sad condition of things as regards the Jews. It is no rare occurrence, especially in the south, for rich Jews to be falsely accused of some imaginary crime and their property confiscated. The victims are glad to escape with their lives, and if they venture to return they are seized as vagabonds or as bearing an assumed name, and banished to Siberia or removed to distant parts of the empire.

ABOUT half the petitions to the throne of grace from churches on last Sunday were for rain, the others were for the recovery of the President. As any considerable amount of rain on the Potomac swamps would breed a pestilential malaria that would be almost certain death to the President, the Lord is placed in a rather awkward predicament, though he had probably determined on his course of action long before the prayers were offered.

AT Bologna, on the 26th of September, there is to be a congress of geologists, at which all civilized countries are to be represented, for the purpose mainly of effecting uniformity in the geological nomenclature of the world. The deliberations are to be conducted in French. A preliminary convention was held in Paris in 1873, and the proceedings at that conference will show results in the one soon to meet. Commissions appointed to report upon many different countries are expected to contribute valuable and interesting information and suggestions.

THE Chinese government, for some reasons not stated, recently issued a decree commanding its subjects to abstain from shaving the head for a period of one hundred days. Detected in the act of disobeying this arbitrary regulation, between fifty and sixty persons in the city of Foochow alone were on the 11th of June sentenced to receive castigation with bamboo rods, and to pay each a fine of three thousand cash (about $6). It is stated by the local journals that before liberation the heads of the offenders were, as a wholesome warning to others, carefully painted and varnished.

MISSIONARIES and temperance preachers must be careful in Germany how they expostulate with persons accustomed to take strong drink. One of these gentlemen entered a tavern recently in the Thuringian village of Walldorf, and seeing one of the villagers sitting there with a glass of grog, laid before him two tracts, one bearing the title, "A Nut for Unbelievers to Crack," and the other, "A Hog Among Men." The latter was devoted to showing the wickekness and beastliness of liquor drinking. The villag r looked upon this act as a personal insult, and upon his complaint before a criminal magistrate, the missionary has been sentenced to pay a fine of $6 and to eight days' imprisonment.

WILLIAM KING, of Williamstown, N. J., has rendered himself liable to a fine of $500 or eighteen months' imprisonment, or both, by marrying his mother-in-law. The daughter of the present Mrs. King was Mr. King's third wife. She died in October last, and presently Mr. King began to pay his addresses to his mother-in-law, then Mrs. Smith. But he had a rival in Joseph Doughty, the father-in-law of his third wife's sister, who wooed with vigor. King was successful, however, and recently was married to his mother-in-law. There is now a bare possibility that the irate and disappointed father-in-law of King's third wife's sister may seek vengeance upon King for marrying the mother of his daughter-in-law, by bringing King's violation of the state laws to the attention of the grand jury.

THERE is a story that the popular hymn, "The Sweet By and By," was the work of two men while drunk. Joseph P. Webster, who composed the music, died several years ago. Dr. S. F. Bennett, author of the verses, lives at Richmond, Ill. He says that the charge of intoxication is untrue, though Webster was a free drinker. The two wrote a hymn book in 1874, and "The Sweet By and By" was one of the pieces jointly produced for it. The suggestion came from a chance remark by Webster, who was habitually despondent, that all would be well "by and by." Bennett at once made the rhymes, and Webster brought the music out of a fiddle, which was his customary aid in composition. The hymn book had its day and is forgotten; but this one tune is put into every new publication of the kind, and has a sale of 10,000 copies a year in sheet form. Dr Bennett says that he and Webster were not orthodox Christians when the hymn was written, and that he is now even less a believer.

MR. WILFRID S. BLUNT, the well-known orientalist, has just completed a census from the best obtainable authorities of Mohammedanism. According to him, the creed numbers 175,000,000 believers, divided into four sects, of which the Sunites are 145,000,000. There were 93,250 pilgrims at Mecca last year. But the most singular feature of Blunt's record is the spread of Islamism into the heart of Africa. In the Dark Continent the faith is alive and at work, and is proselyting as fiercely as in the days of the caliphs of Bagdad. Each year adds thousands of converts to the faith of the prophet, and the result will shortly be the erection of another Mohammedan caliphate in Soudan, which is now largely Islamite. The work which this creed has done in the civilization of the world will never be appreciated; and now again in Africa, as centuries ago in Europe, the crescent is shining brightly upon a benighted people. Our debt to the Arabs in Spain and to the Ottomans in southeastern Europe will never be paid. Their philosophers laid the foundation of almost every science that we hav; their commanders taught us strategy and modern war.

"DID you get my article on the revival of orthodoxy?" asked a Brooklyn clergyman approaching the managing editor of the Eagle recently. "I did," replied the editor, "and it's in type. Be put in to-morrow's paper." "Some conversation with the brethren has materially modified my views, and I wish to withdraw the thesis temporarily," explained the clergyman. "All right," said the editor, "I'll attend to it." "But," remonstrated the minister, with a smile, "you journalists are subject to aberration of recollection, and you may forget it. Would you object to making it a certainty now?" "Of course not. Here, Swipes, tell the foreman to hunt through the God galleys and kill the Rev. Postledrum." "They had an accident out there a bit ago, and I guess the orthodoxy was pied, sir." "Ah! That's all right. Then your stuff has gone into the hell box, Mr. Postledrum, and you needn't trouble about it. Be glad to hear from you again, sir. It's rather clever slush." And the reverend gentleman retired, wondering if orthodoxy had received another blow, or whether he was the victim of printing-office technique.—Brooklyn Eagle.

WE are informed that fifteen miles northeast of here, on Greasy Creek, one of the greatest and most miraculous springs on record has recently been discovered. We hav not been to see it, but our informant, a good citizen and a Baptist preacher of celebrity, tells us what he saw. Parson John R. Yeatts was at the spring last week, and he says the spring flows from a mountain about four hundred feet high, comes out of the ground one hundred feet from the top of the mountain, on the north side, and flows at the rate of about forty gallons per minute, and it is the color of apple cider, and tastes just like apple brandy, and has the same effect. Those under the influence of the water are perfectly ecstatic, and hugging and loving everything they meet. He says: "I never saw the like; children and boys and girls hugging and kissing every one they meet. Old men and old women, young men and young ladies, embracing each other by hugging and kissing. I met an old white-haired man and woman—I suppose about eighty years old—and they were hopping and skipping like lambs. I saw hundreds lying around the spring so drunk that they could not stand up, and they were lying and laughing and trying to slap their hands. The people call them the 'Millennium Springs.'"—Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette.

CHAPTER XVI.

In a greater confusion I had never been than on the following morning. I appeared incomprehensible to myself and wavering between contradictions. Madame Bertellon seemed to love me; heroically had she hitherto battled against a passion which stained the nobleness of her soul. It was I, miserable wretch, who, without loving her, could side with her passion and blow on an unfortunate flame, by which she was consumed, and I, more than the unfortunate one, must become disgraced.

In vain I recalled to myself the sacredness of my duties; in vain I laid bare to myself the shameful ingratitude which I committed against Bertollon's generous friendship; in vain I thought of Clementine's and my quiet vows; all that was once charming and venerated to me had lost power and influence. The intoxication of my senses continued uninterruptedly; before my fancy floated only Bertollon's amiable wife; I still felt on my lips the glow of her returned kiss, and my flattered vanity destroyed with deceiving conclusions and inferences the earnest warnings of my conscience.

"Wretched one, thou wilt yet regret, thou wilt once blush before thy shameful deed, and even the frost of old age will not be able to cool the burning of the troubled conscience within thee!" So I spoke to myself. I tried to be strong. While I yet indulged in the remembrances of the past evening, and gloomy forebodings made me tremble, I seated myself at the table, in order to write to Madame Bertollon, to describe to her the danger in which we both were placed through our intercourse, and to tell her, that I, in order to remain worthy of her friendship, had to leave her, had to leave Montpellier.

And while holy reason dictated its commands to my pen, and I desired to make to virtue the first great sacrifice, I wrote to Madame Bertollon the most sacred oaths of love; I lied to her, how I was consumed by secret passion, and how I only in her love could find my heaven. I implored, I conjured her, not to let me perish, and unfolded before her fancy an exciting picture of our happiness.

I sprang up. I read, and read, and tore the letter in pieces, and wrote a second one, and wrote all of the former again, and read and tore it again. As by an unknown power I was dragged against my will toward the crime before which in vain my soul shuddered. While I took an oath, took an oath in a half-loud voice, to leave yet this very day for Nismes, and never again to look upon the walls of Montpellier, I vowed silently to myself never to forsake the angel-like, unfortunate woman, and to cling to her, even if I should draw unavoidable death with her kisses.

It seemed to me as if two souls with equal strength and skill were wrestling within me. But my reflection grew obscure; the feeling of duty died in the feeling of all-consuming passion. I resolved to hasten to Madame Bertollon. Perhaps she also, on account of her exhibited weakness, tormented herself with reproaches; perhaps she also thought of fleeing from me and Montpellier. I would hold her back. I wanted to reason away her objections, and preach to her the justification of our love.

I sprang up and toward the door. "To perish then?" it cried within me. "To perish after all the glory of long preserved inmost innocence?" I faltered and stepped back.

"Be pure like God and remain so! This day and this storm pass away, then thou art rescued!" said I to myself.

This religious sentiment lifted me up. The thought, Be pure like God! always made itself heard above the turmoil of my wild passion, and held me back, at least for this time, from hastening at once to Madame Bertollon. But undecided the battle remained. My longing now became louder, and I almost mocked at my own religiousness.

Then the door of my room was opened. Mr. Bertollon stepped in.

"What art thou doing, dear Colas? Thou dost not feel well?" said he. Not until now I observed that I had thrown myself upon the bed. I sprang up. He offered me his hand, but I was without courage to giv him mine.

"But what aileth thee? Thy look is so disturbed, Colas! Thou lookest pale!" said he again. But I could not answer.

"Disclose to him all that has happened!" it exclaimed within me. "To the husband disclose all, all; then is at once erected the eternal partition-wall between thyself and his wife, and thou remainest pure, dost not become seducer of a wife, a traitor to thy noble benefactor, deceiver of thy friend!"

"Bertollon, I am miserable because I love thy wife!" said I quickly and with fear. I would not end the confession. And hardly had I thrust forth the last syllable when I regretted it, but now too late. It was done. The husband knew it all. But for once I was rescued.

In the wild paroxysm of sensuality, when powerful passion battles with our sense for duty, only a sudden, decisiv action, which we acknowledge to be means of rescue, can save. We must, as it were, drive by force the slow body to exercise it until we can go back no more. I felt as one being tossed between the waves of the ocean, to whom, at the point of drowning, the indistinct branches of the shore float before the dim eyes in stupefaction, and an inner voice says, "Seize them!"

Bertollon grew pale and said, "What dost thou say, Colas?"

"I must away. I must leave Montpellier, must flee thee and thy wife, for I love her!" answered I.

"Thou art a fool, I believe!" said he, smiling, and regained his color.

"O Bertollon, I am in earnest. I must not remain here. Thy wife is a noble woman. But I am afraid my intercourse with her becomes destructiv to thee and me. Yet it is time. Thou art my friend, my benefactor; I shall not deceive thee. Take this bitter confession as a proof of my love for thee. I am too weak to be always master of myself, and thy wife is so amiable that I could not be indifferent at her side."

"A saint like thee, Colas," said Bertollon, laughing loud, "who to the husband himself confesses the secrets of his heart in pious devotion, is dangerous to no husband. Be quiet. Thou remainest with us. Who will make so much trouble of a love affair? I trust thee, and hav no suspicion against thee, nor against my wife. This may suffice for thee. If you two love each other, what can I do against your hearts? And if you would roll between you the whole globe, would you on that account love less? Would your separation also separate your hearts? Love each other. I know you both think too noble to forget yourselvs!"

He said this all so unembarrassed and merry, and with the tone of unsuspecting confidence, that I, moved, clasped him to my heart. His generosity renewed my strength for the good. I was ashamed of my baseness, and even that I had fought so hard a battle.

"No," said I, "dear Bertollon, I would be a monster if I could betray thy confidence and could recompense thy friendship so shamefully. Thou hast now brought me again to the feeling of my better self. I love, and the recollection of thy trust will prevent any disgracing thought in me. I remain and will prove to thee that I am worthy of thee. I shall break off my intercourse with thy wife. I will never see her without witnesses. I will ——"

"What do you tell me that for?" interrupted Bertollon. "Sufficient, I trust thee. Dost thou think that I not long ago noticed that my wife loves thee? that her love bears the color of her violent, vehement character? that her passion be the more powerful the more she hides it? Impart to her thy noble principles, and cure her, if thou wilt, but do it with caution. I know her; her love could very soon change itself into a fearful hatred, and then woe unto thee!"

"What dost thou mean, Bertollon? Shall I cure her of a disease under which I myself perish? And what dost thou speak of the violence of her temper? Never hav I of that discovered even the slightest hue."

"Friend Colas, thou dost not know the women. In order to please thee she will certainly not put herself in the shade. And if she does forget herself once thy love makes thee blind."

Herewith he broke off the conversation and engaged my attention in a strange narrativ. He did not suffer that I should begin again the former theme. The more I had cause to admire the greatness of his confidence the cooler I became myself, and the more resolved to separate myself by degrees from his wife.

CHAPTER XVII.

Not before the evening of the following day did I see her again. She sat lonely in her room, her beautiful head resting melancholy on her arm. She arose as soon as she perceived me; her face was full of sweet confusion.

I approached her. We both remained for a long time speechless. She had cast down her eyes.

"May I yet dare to appear before you?" said I, trembling. "I come only to do penance for my transgression."

She remained silent.

"I hav abused your confidence," continued I. "I should entertain only esteem for the wife of my only friend. I hav done wrong."

"And I!" she stammered with a low voice.

"Alas, madame, I feel it. I am too little under my own control; and who could be so sufficiently in your presence? But—and should it cost my life I will not disturb your peace. My resolution is taken and irrevocable. I hav disclosed to your husband the innermost of my heart."

"Disclosed?" cried she, scared, "and he "

"He grew pale at first."

"He grew pale?" she stammered.

"But with confidence in you, Madame, and with a confidence greater than my virtue, he attempted to dissuade me from the determination to leave Montpellier."

"Was that your resolution, Alamontada?"

"It is the same yet. I love you, Madame. But you are the wife of Bertollon. I do not want to disturb the peace of a family to which I am under obligations for thousands of beneficent acts."

"You are a noble man," and tears rolled down her cheeks. "You want to do what I had resolved to do. My things are already packed. I dare, I will not conceal from you, Alamontada, that I wish never to hav become acquainted with you. Our friendship degenerated into love. I, in vain, lied to myself. I attempted too late resistance against my wild emotions."

She sobbed more violently. "Yes," exclaimed she, "it is better so. We must separate. But not forever and eternity. No; only until our hearts beat more calmly—until we can meet in cool friendship."

She was silent. I was deeply moved.

"But alas, dear friend!" said she, lamentingly, and threw herself upon my breast. "I shall not survive this separation long."

And while her heart beat on mine, and our passion flamed higher, and our feeling for duty wrestled with it for the victory, the hours flew unnoticed by us.

We confessed to each other eternal, pure, holy love, and vowed and swore yet to kill it in our hearts. We concluded that we should separate, that we would but rarely see each other, and even then only with quietness and never without witnesses, and sealed with numberless kisses the indestructible union of our hearts.

What a wretched being is man! He is always the weakest when he thinks to be the strongest. He who flees the temptation, he is the hero; he who wilfully seeks it in order to gain the crown of virtue has lost it already before he begins the battle.

When we took leave of each other we had agreed that I should go no further than a league's distance from Montpellier. On a country-seat near Castelnau I should liv, and only occasionally visit the city.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Progress of Intellectual Development.

BY FRANCIS D. LACY.

Everything in the universe is essential to fill its place, and by natnre adapted to do so. The laws governing materiality operate from causes to effects, and the effects, conjoining, act as causes for other effects still to follow. Through these principles, all action, change, or evolution is produced, nor are any of the results occurring subject to either accident or mistake, but through absolute necessity each cause or missil sent strikes with definit precision, every point producing results in the line of its destiny. Consequently nothing had the power of creating itself but everything was forced to exist, and is wholly passiv to the natural principles controling it. Natural laws are inherent with materiality, self-existent and eternal, but in the absence of material substance would be non-existent; for they only pervade whereby to control matter, and no laws would be required were there no matter to control.

That matter is the production of mind is evidently illusiv, for how mind could exist without matter is incomprehensible, and out of the order of both nature and reason. If any conceivable mind could possess creativ power, then absolutely it must contain all the possibilities of what it could create; therefore as the means are adequate to the end, this also comes under the law of cause and effect, consequently there lies no miracle. Hence the axiom that something cannot be produced from nothing, nor the tangible ever be rendered extinct.

The idea of mind existing without matter dispenses with the necessity of matter ever existing. Even though an infinit intellectuality, with all the imaginary supreme attributes, could exist from all eternity, and pervade throughout illimitable space devoid of all materiality, we must naturally question what did it exist for, and why the necessity of manufacturing worlds? Could not a finite mind get along as well without a body as an infinite one? Then sing:

Mind and matter dwell together; without either can be neither; both possess their power in one. Ever changing, never failing; ever using, never losing; neither can exist alone. From eternity behind us to eternity ahead, throughout wondrous evolutions, mind and matter onward tread. From the world sublimely rolling through immensity of space, down to atoms 'neath our vision, grandly onward is the race. From beyond the orbs that twinkle to minute worlds 'neath our sight, on the business runs in order, mind and matter still unite. Without one wherefore the other? What is substance without thought? Worlds unnumbered known to nothing are equivalent to nought. Wherefore thought o'er nought to labor? What accomplishments are made? What a barren, idle heaven, without elements for aid.

Changing the form does not affect the quantity, nor destroy any of the principles that matter possesses. Could the universe hav been weighed a billion of years ago, and again at the present time, the difference would not "stir the scale or rock the beam," nor since that time would any of the principles hav been lost.

Everything is in a state of growth, yet nature in the aggregate never progresses or retrogrades; yet development borders closely on destruction, and the building up of one thing is equivalent to the tearing down of another; therefore dissolution is but reorganization. The course of nature is origin, development, and decay; hence birth is but a token that death is to follow, yet the dead, to nature, are worth just as much as the living. Then sing:

Crowd on, thou restless forces of infinity sublime, and bear, from all eternity to never-ending time, the self-existent principles that never can astray, in all this endless ocean while evolving on their way. To that which through development surrenders up and dies, shall be applied new forces, and the same again shall rise; nor smallest of identities be unto nature lost, for could the least be stricken out, so likewise might the most.

But in the sense of organization, that which had its origin must hav its end, else all the evolutions of nature would at once be at a stand-still. For illustration, if the cosmogony of worlds ever took place, which is scarcely a question, then their destruction is certain, for the principles that evolve are identically the same that destroy.

To contemplate the fact that all the densities within our observation, and all existing in the innumerable worlds of the universe, were once in an ethereal condition, perhaps a thousand times more rarefied than our common air, and that the rapid action by which come forth the vegetable productions, and the wonderful phenomena of forcing into being the myriads of living identities, were all occasioned by the operations of certain natural forces existing inherent in the material itself, it creates a wide stretch of the imagination, but develops a truth as potent as the fact that we liv and realize our existence.

Could the mind but possess a sufficiently extensiv knowledge of the chemical affinities, electric forces, and philosophical working of atoms, it would not be difficult to trace their course from the condition they occupy in ethereal space to the densified and organized bodies they form.

Why the atoms in rarefied condition tend to develop into vegetable productions and animal life just as they do after forming into planets, suns, and comets is a question presupposing a guide antecedent to such developments. How results can come without their causes would overthrow our course of logic; and any substance or forces proceeding from whatsoever source they may, presupposes a fountain adequate to such results. How inorganic material in ethereal form can build cities, construct railroads and steamboats for transportation of some of the same material that actually proceeded from the celestial regions before being organized into worlds, brings a solid fact to question; nor does it matter through what course of development the material has come to produce man, yet still man's works are but a secondary condition of nature, and his grandest intellectual developments are but the results of molecules at work, guided by a certain intellectual force onward to this end.

The origin of the species, to our understanding, seems to be the commencement of intellectual development; but is it possible for nature to produce what she does not possess? If not, then she held in possession, billions of years ago, all the possibilities of what she possesses to-day. If this be so, then the thinking principle existing in all animated creatures, at the present time, must hav eternally formed some portion of the guiding principle controling the universe, and, in accordance with our reasoning, necessarily forms some portion of that controling principle yet.

Now as a sign which may answer for an inference, we here would ask if in the construction of a clock we discover any principle of design? Most certainly, for it is easy to appreciate the labor of our own kind. But compare the rough mechanism of the clock to the systematic, wonderful, and harmonious formation of the solar system, and then with the universe, and see which indicates the grandest design. But you say that these celestial bodies, with their harmonious action, are the work of nature. That is very true, so also is the clock; but the one came through the agency of man, and the other came through an agency still higher than man. That which is above the human understanding may appear as illusiv as that which we know to be erroneous. It is difficult for man to comprehend a higher intellectuality than himself, but he overlooks the thousands of proofs constantly surrounding him. Not that I would lead the mind to the miraculous attributes of heathen deities, but that if man has thinking power, then why hav not greater things than man thinking power also? Does not the earth require, as an organized being, as much thought to traverse her course with lightning speed, in the path of her orbit, as man to pursue the habits of his sphere? You say, no; for man labors for self-preservation, and the earth is controled by natural principles. That is true, but it is also true that the earth and all heavenly bodies are laboring for self-preservation, as well as man, while man is governed also by natural principles as much as they.

Now here is a fact worthy of consideration. There is a reason why intellectual beings exist, and as has already been shown, this principle of mentality is the most precious portion of nature. Now if this be the most important part, as is plainly seen, that without an appreciation of what exists the universe would be but a blank; then why not this principle be diffused as extensivly throughout the universe as it is in the power of nature to develope. If a small portion of this quality is essential, a larger portion is still more desirable. Therefore, if it is possible for a world to possess, as an organized being or body, living and thinking qualities, then such would be necessary prerequisits in nature's economy. When I first presented this theory by lecture and through newspaper communications, I received the scoff of ridicule from some, and the eye of pity from others, but those who scorn my theory or pity my mania fail to present any tangible opposition. The conditions whereby inorganic material is evolved into organized bodies, possessing life and intellectuality, certainly do not deny that a planet may possess a realization of life, and a sense of its identity, but on the contrary, substantially, declare that it must possess and sustain these qualities within itself, and without these qualities it could never act as the fountain from which intellectual beings spring forth. For illustration, let us consider the physiological conditions necessary to sustain life in the body and produce thought. We will consider the human system, as it is the most interesting to contemplate, and the highest order of animation known to us. In the first place, in the nature of every living and thinking creature or being, exist three definit qualities, namely, the living, moving, and thinking principles. These constitute three definit and separate systems, yet it is necessary that they all harmoniously conjoin that any may be potently manifested. The action of these parts is but the result of material organization and physiological condition. Material elements are necessarily the tangible constituents whereby all bodily action is produced, and in order to sustain in operation the physical functions new material must be regularly supplied. Withhold it the system famishes, and a sense of realization in the body is no more. The living principle relates to all the involuntary action manifested in the body, which may be represented as operating upon the food from the time it is received into the mouth until it is assimilated to the removal of the worn-out tissues, unfit for further service, and cast away. The desire that is felt to enjoy the taste creates a natural inclination for mastication, and nature has provided a means to accomplish it. Next, how peculiar is the muscular action of the œsophagus to convey the same to the stomach, never forgetting which end to commence swallowing at. The stomach, concomitant with the œsophagus, is ready to receive the new supply of food, and is made to feel its requirements from a peculiar pain created in the numerous nerves thereof from the absence of food, which are sensitiv to the conditions, being tributaries to the eighth pair of sympathetic nerves.

Next, nature made no mistake in the office to which she applied the stomach. While its action upon the food is truly wonderful, in one sense it is almost laughable. Let us consider for a moment the principles of digestion, how a fluid is secreted, of such materials as pepsin, salivary matter, mucus, lactic acid, and salin matters so associated together as to produce a solution of the most powerfully dissolving nature upon the food at the temperature of its action of any combination of materials known.

Let the best practical chemist in existence associate the elements most natural for food, and then at a temperature of only ninety-eight and one-half degrees bring to bear the most powerful dissolvent materials, with the most artful device he is master of, for fermentation and digestion, and my word for it, the stomach will do more for it in two hours than the chemist can in ten, while at the same time nature is running both machines. But while the stomach prepares the food, adapted to pass on to receive the next process, the chemist has left his poisonous to the system, and well calculated to inflame the tissues and clog the circulation.

It is interesting to notice the construction, or rather formation, of the mucous membrane or villous coat, and its secretion, and the rapid action thereof. Suffice to say that nothing in any other form, or any different quality of secretion, could do the business so well, or, in other words, could do it at all. Next consider the muscular fibers, which unite to form the tissue of the mucous membrane, the powerful and rapid action of this membrane, and its adaptation to either the large or small quantity of food that may be in the stomach. Consider, also, how the pylorus guards the food from passing out of the stomach until it is in a proper condition of chyme, to be chemicalized into chyle by the excretions of the liver and pancreas, while passing through the duodenum, before reaching the lacteals in the intestins. Were it possible to discern and understand the chemical action of the bile and pancreatic juice, and the lightning quickness of their dissolvent effects upon the chyme while in the duodenum, before any portion of it is in proper condition to be received through the lacteals into the thoracic duct, it would beggar all attempt at description, and leave the mind in awe at the wonderful workings of the elements in our own physical systems.

Then, again, let us consider how this material is pumped up by the muscular action of the heart, to unite with the venous blood to be forced through the pulmonary arteries to the lungs, there to undergo another chemical change of lightning quickness, before being arterialized to return to the heart. Back to the heart through the pulmonary veins it is drawn, whereby to be forced through the left portion of the heart with such powerful pressure into the arteries as to send the blood to the uttermost extremities of the body, where these millions of channels, separated, ramify with such delicate minuteness that it would be impossible for the cuticle to be pierced with the finest cambric needle without puncturing one or more of them. Through these millions of delicate hoses they hav deposited on their way their new loads of material to each and every portion, whereby to renew every article of tissue throughout the whole spiritual tenement.

Then we find that where the arteries terminate, the capillaries, which are tributaries to the veins, arise. The worn-out material is judiciously collected up, and by rigid economy is conducted to the glands to be cleansed, or separated, the waste portion to be conveyed from the system, and the remainder, acceptable for further use, to be conveyed back through the heart and to the lungs for arterialization. In this way, with what is added by respiration, every portion of the body is supplied with the necessary material required to sustain life in the organization.

A Peace Congress in 1885.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The National Arbitration League of Washington, D. C., desire to make an appeal to the friends of humanity everywhere for moral support in their great undertaking, which has for its aim the "peace on earth and good will to men," so long prayed for. The movement has been organized for many months. Its object is the settlement of all national disputes by arbitration, to be brought about by agitation in every nation, but especially by a world's conference at Washington in 1885, when, from all portions of the earth, great numbers will be attending the contemplated Boston World's Fair.

This seems to be a time when a movement of this kind could become practicable. Many travelers over the earth agree that there are in all civilized countries persons of influence who hav means, know the English language, and would be glad of the honor of representing their respectiv countries in a convention of this magnitude. The recent desire of some of the countries in South America for arbitration from the United States after being desolated by war makes this undertaking at this time a very important one.

Representativs from the National Arbitration League are now abroad appealing to those in power in other lands and urging the importance of our cause.

There is every indication of a general coming together among the nations of the earth, which assembly, after due deliberation, will probably issue an address to the world, advising, among other things, the formation of a family of nations to educate the people on a peace footing, so that by the dawn of the twentieth century all armies and navies can be disbanded over the whole earth.

It is hoped that Arbitration Leagues will be commenced in every county in the United States, as well as in all other countries, so that it will be very unpopular for those in power to expend so many millions for war when education is everywhere so much demanded.

IN the district of Saratow, in Russia, a new religious sect, called "The Underground Sect," is said to be gaining followers. The peculiar name is derived from the habit practiced by the followers of this eccentric form of belief of seeking out caves and other subterranean places of refuge as habitations. They liv an ascetic life, taking only bread and water for food and drink, and tolerating no union of the sexes. Their dead are buried under cover of night, from which the notion has gained currency among the peasantry that they throw the bodies into the Volga.

THE Rev. William Marshall, colored, of Clark county, Ky., announces that he will pray for any desired object for 75 cents.

Report of the Michigan Camp-Meeting.

The second annual camp-meeting of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists was held near Battle Creek on the bank of Goguac Lake, one of those beautiful sheets of clear crystal water for which the state is noted, and on whose bosom two small steamers are plying, besides an almost indefinit number of sail and row-boats of various shapes and sizes, with seeming variety enough to gratify the aquatic desire of the most versatil in attendance. The beautiful rolling grounds lying adjacent to the lake gave evidence that the hand of nature had been true in contributing its proportion to the attractions requisit for the occasion. The rostrum and seating were well arranged, and a large tent owned by the Association was pitched in close proximity, to be used as occasion might require. A dancing pavilion was another attraction to those who "trip the light fantastic toe." The primitiv condition of the grounds precluded the admission of carriages, which proved a detriment to the local attendance, while the attendance from the state at large was good.

Aug. 12, 1881.—On arriving at the grounds many familiar faces from the various portions of the state are encountered on this the opening day of the camp, which augurs well for the future of the meeting, for they are here with their tents and all the paraphainalia of camp life.

Aug. 13th.—Campers continue to arrive on all trains, so that before night the grounds are well dotted with evidences of a fixed purpose to make this a time long to be remembered. At 2 o'clock P. M. the President, L. S. Burdick, took the chair on the rostrum and faithfully discharged the duties of the position at every session held there during the meeting. The afternoon was devoted to a conference. An evening session was held, Mr. Kenyon, of Wisconsin, speaking on "The Origin of Mind." Singing by H. C. Andrews, of Bridgeport, Mich.

Sunday, Aug. 14th.—At 9:30 a conference of one hour was held. At 10:30 J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, spoke from the rostrum, giving a review of the Liberal movement, urging a compact union of all anti-church people as the only sure method of success. Singing by S. Bigelow, of Kalamazoo. At 2 P. M. A. B. French, of Clyde, O., gave an address on "The Old and the New; or, Our Losses and Gains." Giving and getting and getting and giving is the order of nature in the processes of life. We grow mutually and spiritually by so doing. Singing by Mr. Wadsworth and friends of Lapur City. The evening address was by Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, of Discoe, Mich., her subject being "Generation and Regeneration." Man's material nature has need of supplies as much as his spiritual nature. Singing by S. Bigelow.

Monday, Aug. 15th.—The forenoon of each day being advertised to be devoted exclusivly to mediums, the President called the meeting in the tent at 10 o'clock, when they proceeded to organize among themselvs by electing Dr. Hills of Wisconsin, as chairman, continuing their sessions each forenoon during the week. At 2 o'clock P. M. Mrs. L. A. Pearsall spoke from the rostrum on the different reforms of modern times, and three of the evils sustained in the Bible, viz., strong drink, slavery of women, and polygamy. On account of the inclemency of the evening atmosphere the outdoor sessions were suspended, and two lectures from the rostrum were given each afternoon. The second lecture was given by Dr. G. H. Geer of Minnesota, from the subject, "What is the Worth of the Phenomena of Modern Spiritualism?" It is a fact with which scientists must deal. He argued for more culture among Spiritualists, with less fanaticism. The singing for the afternoon was by Mr. Wadsworth and friends of Lapur City.

Tuesday, Aug. 16th.—Mediums' meeting at 11 A.M. At 2 P. M. Mrs. M. C. Gale, of North Lansing, Mich., gave an address on "The Law of Mediumship." The second address was given by A. B. French; subject, "Whence am I and Where am I; or, Intimations of a Future Existence." Life is too short to complete our powers, and cannot be destroyed. He spoke of the power and permanency of memory, likening it to a faithful guardian treasuring up our experiences. The testimony of the dying was also good evidence. Singing by the Lapur friends.

Wednesday, Aug. 17th.—Mediums' meeting in the tent at 10 A. M. At 2 P. M. J. H. Burnham spoke from the rostrum on "Self; or, the Personal Entity of the Ego." Nothing is destroyed in nature. Matter remains indestructible, and so must personal entity and the disintegrated elements of old forms go to make up new ones. Dr. G. H. Geer gave the second address, on "The Coming Ministry," contrasting the work of the past with that of the future. The lessons of to-day are for us to profit by; those of the past were given to another generation. Singing by the Lapur friends.

Thursday, Aug. 18th.—Mediums' meeting in the tent at 10 A.M. A slight rain necessitated the seating of the dancing pavilion for the session at 2 P.M. The opening song was by the Lapur friends. The first lecture was by Mrs. M. C. Gale, on "The Philosophy and Evidence of Spiritualism, and the Beauty of Spirit Communion." The ignorance of the people is a greater barrier to progress than the frauds of mediums, for they are sensitiv, and partake of the atmosphere surrounding them, therefore we should not approach them deceptivly unless we are willing to accept deception in return. Song by Mrs. Gale. A. B. French read a poem entitled, "The First Settler's Story," by Will Carleton, after which he spoke on "Toleration, Fraternization, and Charity," asking, "What is truth?" It is that point to which there can be no addition and from which there can be no subtraction. Truth is eternal and will be its own champion in time. Scientists and religionists all hav some truth in them which will be preserved, while their falsehoods will decay. Spiritualists claim to hav the truth, but they are often intolerant and mistaken, and that man is not Liberal who measures the universe by his own range of vision. He compared truth to the beautiful firmament of heaven, which is not always discernible when obscured by clouds. Closing song by the Lapur friends. Before adjournment Hon. S. B. McCracken, of Detroit, offered the following resolutions, which were passed unanimously by a rising vote:

Resolved, That this meeting adds its voice to the universal condemnation and reprobation of the wicked and insane attempt upon the life of the President of the United States, and we record our earnest hope that the event may disappoint the fears of a fatal issue that at this time oppress the nation, and we look upon the pretense of the church to effect physical results in the case of the suffering chief magistrate as a solemn mockery in the face of a great national calamity.

Resolved, That we honor the just and patriotic position so firmly taken and consistently held by Governor Roberts, of Texas, in declining to be a party in officially recommending a religious observance under the name of thanksgiving, for the reason assigned by him, namely, "Because I do not deem it consistent with my position as governor to issue a proclamation directing religious services where church and state are and ought to be kept separate in their functions."

Resolved, That in response to the request by the commission acting under the authority of a law of this state in preparing a revision of the general tax law, asking for a popular expression on the subject of the taxation of church property, this meeting representing the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, hereby repeats the hitherto frequently expressed demand of said Association that all private property should be required to bear its just proportion of the cost of maintaining the government which gives it protection.

Friday, Aug. 19th.—Mediums' meeting in the tent with more than usual interest. At 2 P. M. M. Babcock, of St. John's, Mich., spoke from the rostrum, criticising religion, so called, and the idea of a God generally. He, nor any of his family, ever saw a God or knew anything about one. We want truth and not victory. No man should be forced to pay for blank cartridges. Crime is hereditary, and the same effort should be made to improve the human race as the animal kingdom. J. H. Burnham then spoke on "Our Slow Growth in Comparison with our Hopes." We hav been prohibited from thinking so long that we are like the eagle that has been caged for years till it doubts its ability to fly from the mountain crest. Men and women never get to be thinkers without disciplin and effort. He contended for charity during the transition incident to the evolution of human thought. The singing for the session was by Mrs. M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Mich.

Saturday, Aug. 20th.—Mediums' meeting in the tent at 10 A. M. with still increasing interest. Afternoon session at 2 P. M. was opened by a song from Mrs. M. Babcock, followed by a lecture from M. Babcock on "Superstition," saying that he borrowed his ideas from Ingersoll, and Ingersoll borrowed from the next man, while we all owe what we are to the exchange of ideas. Many things in the Bible he did not believe. Why should God giv the Bible to you and me, while millions hav died who never saw it? Mrs. Babcock then read a poem entitled "Eternal Justice," by Gerald Massey. Song by S. Bigelow. Second lecture by Rev. C. A. Andrus, of Flushing, Mich., who took for his subject "What Should be Eternal Justice." Everything that is true to the condition that produced it is justice. A man created half animal must liv out those conditions. Revolution is but the working out of the law of justice if it only bring better conditions.

Sunday, Aug. 21st.—Conference at 9:30 A. M. from the rostrum. At 10 o'clock song by S. Bigelow, when S. B. McCracken spoke on the organization of Spiritualists and Liberalists, what value do we place on it? He advocated taxation of church property and spoke against employing chaplains in Congress, legislatures, and armies. The second lecture of the morning was by W. F. Jamieson, his subject being "Universal Mental Liberty." He regarded liberty as the best creed a man could hav if he must hav one. The man who fears criticism is in doubt about his own position. If Spiritualism is true he could not argue it out of existence. He differed with Moses Hull, but Moses should hav an opportunity to defend himself, and people who were unwilling to accord him that right should themselvs be in doubt.

Afternoon session at 2 P.M.—Song by S. Bigelow. Address by C. A. Andrus in favor of Spiritualism, coveting honest criticism. Science has failed to account for certain phenomena, never disputing them, but always trying to explain them. It some one has witnessed them, it should not invalidate the testimony of those who hav. An original poem was then read by Mrs. L. E. Drake, late of California, entitled, "Old Flag, Art Thou an Emblem of the Free?" J. H. Burnham then gave the concluding address, on "Selfishness," which he regarded as the prime factor in all systems of religion. Every appeal to man's nature is selfish, and he is urged to right that he may escape certain punishments and gain certain rewards, but never because it is right and just. He would rather accept the torments than receive the rewards on terms that would compromise his honor.

Sunday evening there was a conference in the tent, which closed the sessions of the meeting.

Monday, Aug. 22d was occupied in breaking camp and the partings incident to the close of such a meeting.

Spiritualism Not Necessarily Lunacy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been familiar with, and a large share of the time a subscriber to, your paper since its first publication, and I would not like to do without it at the present or in the near future especially, so I must remit the year's subscription. I hav never, as I remember, occupied your columns with a single paragraph. I do not hesitate to announce at once that I hav been a candid and I trust somewhat intelligent investigator of spiritual phenomena and philosophy for over thirty years. To my knowledge I hav never been pronounced a "lunatic" only by total strangers. I think you understand as well as I that a large and perhaps respectable portion of your patrons belong to the same class. I never knew an instance when one of them called a Materialist a "fraud," or a "lunatic," a "deluded dupe," or a fool. I certainly regret that your Cincinnati correspondent has so far forgotten the attributes of a gentleman as to indulge in such language against a very large number of independent and Liberal thinkers who are industriously engaged in accomplishing the same purpose as the Materialists, and I think perhaps a little friendly criticism may do him no harm.

Almost in the outset he indulges in the profound exclamation, "Bah!" I see no reason why, only I suppose it is natural to some organizations. I hav frequently heard the same exclamation used in the farm yard by individuals who were very young, but they always get over it with a little age and experience, and I entertain hopes that our friend of Cincinnati will do the same.

Mr. Winter manifests the most stupid ignorance in every statement he has made concerning the subject upon which he has undertaken to write. He says, "Every phase of supernaturalism is a fraud."

Very well, let it be that or anything he pleases. I think I may safely, without increasing my liabilities, offer a thousand dollars a head for every intelligent Spiritualist he can bring who recognizes any supernatural condition whatever. For his information as well as any others who may happen to be ignorant, I will say that one of the strong points Spiritualists make and teach is that all things are inside of the natural universe and governed by law, and that a supernatural realm is entirely mythical and a vain delusion.

"Faith in things non-provable is the faith of fools." Now, I may safely offer another thousand for every intelligent so-called Spiritualist he can bring who will acknowledge any faith in anything, in accordance with the theological meaning and acceptation of that term.

Theological faith is simply the acceptance and belief in a dogma which is entirely unknowable without any evidence whatever. Spiritualists stand right up shoulder to shoulder with the Materialist in their endeavors to destroy all faiths and all dogmatic teachings of the religionist or any one else. If I understand it, they hav no beliefs in a theological sense, but they simply arrive at conclusions, and entertain opinions based upon evidence presented to the mind individually.

There is no such sect any more than there is of Materialists. When he says, "I challenge the whole pack of supernaturalists," whoever he referred to, the language is low and vulgar; but as those he doubtless meant do not belong to that class, it is quite sufficient to expose his ignorance in relation to the matter.

Evidences hav been presented to my mind all along during the last thirty years quite sufficient to convince me of a continued conscious existence after the dissolution of the physical organism, but I would not cross the street to convince Mr. Winter of the truth of my opinions. If it is true he will find it out himself at some time, probably soon enough; if it is not it's no matter. But I see no good reason why I should be called a lunatic or an idiot because I hav been compelled from evidence to arrive at such a conclusion. I had no choice in the matter any more than Mr. Winter in becoming a Materialist. He thinks as he does simply because he cannot help it, and I do the same.

I had not learned before that THE TRUTH SEEKER was directing its batteries toward Spiritualism, and I am not aware that any individuals hav changed their views from reading its pages. I read it because most of the sentiments advocated correspond with my own. I consider myself in the same boat, using my best endeavors to spread Liberalism and to assist in demolishing that mighty fabric, the Christian church. With the Materialist, I consider it the greatest obstacle that civilization has to oppose its onward and progressiv march. As a Spiritualist, I can only speak for myself, but I think I giv expression to the general thought of the larger number of that class when I say I stand "cheek by jowl" with Messrs. Ingersoll, Bennett, Parton, and doubtless most others, in the great share of the opinions entertained and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other periodicals of a similar stripe. They look upon the whole system of religious teaching from alpha to omega as an unmitigated farce. So do I. They suppose all laws for the government of man's moral nature are found in the natural universe, and that nothing of the kind has been revealed by any God. I think the same, and so on down the chapter to the last end, where there may be a little divergence. They claim they hav no satisfactory evidence concerning a conscious existence after death. I simply claim I hav obtained such evidence; not "by faith," but by seeing and hearing, I am fully satisfied that others liv, and that I shall liv also. Now, is there anything to quarrel about, or any reason why we should call the other names? I think Mr. Winter will never do it again when he understands the matter a little better. If I should notice all the weak and silly points in his short epistle I might require too much room. But one more, "Where no proof exists, all statements are false." If so, progress is at an end, and the universe at a stand-still. No new ideas can ever be presented unless accompanied by absolute proofs. When Morse first conceived the idea of the telegraph it was a truth, but could he prove it? He asked Congress to assist in proving or demonstrating such truth by aiding in constructing a line to Baltimore, and that body of savans laughed him to scorn. When Fulton was working at his little steamer, the Clermont, the masses who were entirely unqualified to conceive or appreciate his idea called it his folly, and they were quite sure they were correct, for Mr. Fulton was quite unable to prove to them that the thing would be a success, or that it was a truth. I might go right on with incidents of this character if space would permit. And now we sincerely hope Mr. Winter will not hurry matters, but giv these poor deluded lunatics a fair show, giv them time. The demonstrations hav already been of such a character as to satisfy thousands and millions of quiet, intelligent people, and sometime they may reach this "champion Materialist," bold and fearless as he may be, and if not I think the world will still move.

There are a few other occasional writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER who hav made somewhat similar attacks, but I think none I hav noticed hav been quite as severe or quite as ridiculous.

To show our friends that the dear TRUTH SEEKER is not very ardently engaged in the demolition of the Spiritual philosophy, he need turn but a single page from his letter and find a large number of popular Spiritual books advertised which Mr. Bennett seems quite desirous of placing in the hands of a reading and thinking public. A Red-Letter Day for Schoolcraft.

The seventh annual meeting of the Spiritualists at Schoolcraft, Mich., took place Aug. 28th. The day was extremely hot and dusty, yet notwithstanding that a large concourse of people assembled, excursions being run from the north and the south.

At half-past ten the meeting was opened by the reading of a poem by Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, "The People's Advent," by Massey, after which, Mr. Angel not being present, J. W. Kenyon, a Spiritualist lecturer who chanced to be present, was invited to occupy his hour in the morning, which he did most acceptably, his subject being "What is Man?" "Spiritualism," he said, "is the revealer of the mysteries of the ages, revealing the causes at work producing phenomena that hav baffled the world to explain, and that hav shrouded the world in mystery. Somnambulism, presentiments, double appearances, and many other singular phenomena can be explained only by Spiritualism. What is mediumship? Why are some mediums while others are not? The human functions can only be understood by a knowledge of Spiritualism. The past had few mediums; the present has its thousands. This is the result of evolution. Man sprung from the lower expressions of nature through the law of progressiv unfoldings, the infinit past being his father and mother, and he the epitome of the universe, both material and spiritual, the ripe fruit upon the tree of life eternal. It is the product of the everlasting past, and it will require the everlasting future to complete its unfolding."

In the afternoon Dr. Severance, after reading the grand poem, "Eternal Justice," addressed the large audience that had assembled, upon the subject of evolution. She traced the development of matter from the crude conditions of granit rock through the various stages of vegetativ life, and then the animal kingdom from its first semi-vegitativ expression to the highest type of the human being, and then showed how, by the same law of activity and motion that is inherent in all matter, the spirit is evolved, that portion of brain or body in which is the greatest activity evolving the greatest amount of spirit matter. Our forms in spirit life will be fashioned according to the exercise of the various parts, hence the necessity for a thorough cultivation of every part, physically, intellectually, and morally. She then showed how races were developed in the same manner as a child. First were the lower faculties and selfish propenstities, and the religious propensities, and the religious ideas were accordingly low, cruel, and selfish, as manifested in the time of the Mosaic dispensation. Next come the intermediate faculties, recognizing higher truths based upon authority, which was manifest in the Christian dispensation. The last faculties to be developed are the reasoning, when demonstration must supersede authority. To meet this demand come the truths of modern Spiritualism, which is the only evidence we hav of a future life—one in which we are the same in character, disposition, loves, and hates, to which we are progressing by natural methods the same as those just spoken of. She urged that if Spiritualists are to lead the world in its onward march they must throw aside all bigotry and narrow sectarianism and take hold of the vital questions of the day, or some broader movement will supersede it. She then advocated the necessity of the secularization of the government by the taxation of church property, the abolition of chaplaincies and all sectarian teaching in our schools, and the repeal of sabbatarian laws, all public fasts, and the infamous Comstock postal laws. She spoke of the importance of the labor reform movement and the financial question, the rights of woman, necessity of health, and the rational treatment of the sick. These questions are before the world, and must be met by those who will lead the people up to loftier hights. All sickness and premature deaths are in consequence of our ignorance, and can be overcome by proper generation and care, and this will supersede regeneration. Idiots, criminals, and those deformed are the results of our wrong methods, and their production should not be repeated. Criminals should be treated with the intent to cure by proper training and development, and not punished. There is no limit to the possibilities of man's nature when they are unfolded by intelligent effort. She closed by reciting Phœbe Cary's poem, "A Woman's Conclusion." Thus ended the exercises of a day long to be remembered by the listening multitude. ALBERT BURSON, Manager.

A Letter From Dr. Andrews in England.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I hav a recent letter from Mr. Bennett; he had landed at Glasgow, Scotland, and expressed himself as highly pleased with Scotland and the Scotch people. He also advises me that he had a pleasant voyage across the Atlantic, and I think he was pleased with the Anchor line route to Scotland, which I believe he was induced to take through my influence, as I hav always come and gone by that line and route.

The harvest is progressing here midst sunshine and shower. How strange it seems to me! last year and again this year I left the United States in July, and each year the harvest was nearly over there, but not till some weeks after my arrival did it commence here. And how strange, too, that a ten-days voyage across the Atlantic plants one upon another continent where all is so different from our own loved America. I will not undertake to condense any of my observations for your over-crowded columns, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has a representativ here that will glean every item of interest clean to the bone; or, may be better, to the bed-rock.

But knowing the interest that is felt by every Liberal of America, and I might add of the world, to eagerly read every line from the pen of our Colonel Ingersoll, I will copy a fresh letter from the columns of Mr. Charles Watts's Secular Review, published at London, sent by the Colonel to the great Liberal philosopher and orator, G. J. Holyoke. The letter seems to be in response to the dedication of Mr. Holyoke's work, entitled, "Secularism a Religion that Givs Heaven no Trouble." The prefatory remarks to the Colonel conclude with an allusion to the coincident views of Colonel Ingersoll with recent sentiments of the Pall Mall Gazette. I quote: "The Pall Mall Gazette said the reputation of Freethought in this country would be compromised if it appeared that the leading Freethinkers were in favor of taking the oath, although clearly in opposition to their professions to that question." But it is useful to record Col. Ingersoll's coincidence in the views heretofore expressed, he being the most prominent representativ of the Freethought party in the New World. The article is headed, "News from Col. Inhersoll." The Colonel's letter is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1881.

"MY DEAR MR. HOLYOKE: I hardly know with what words to thank you for the beautiful and extremely flattering dedication to me of your new pamphlet, entitled, 'Secularism a Religion which Givs Heaven no Trouble.' You hav made me more than your friend. I read the pamphlet with the greatest interest; it is by far the best I ever read upon this subject. Nothing can be better than your idea about a religion for this world. The whole piece is so full of the spirit of independence, self-reliance, and perfect candor that it is hard to see how the most superficial Christian could read it without feeling real admiration. . . . You are doing great good.

"Do you intend visiting this country again? I read your articles on the duty and policy of Freethinkers whose openly-avowed convictions concerning the belief implied is my feeling to a hair. We hav had a terrible time since the shooting of the President. It was fortunate for me that the assassin was a good Christian, that he had delivered lectures answering me that he was connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, and that he had spent most of his life reading the sacred scriptures.

"Your letter would hav been answered long, long ago, only for the fact that I was absent in New Mexico, where I was looking after some mining interest.

The above letter and prefatory remarks were communicated to the Secular Review by Mr. Holyoke, and after the letter he givs the remarks of Henry Ward Beecher upon the political stand last fall, extolling the Colonel, and also the Colonel's complimentary remarks on Beecher, etc., and concludes the article with these words: "I hav told Col. Ingersoll that my hope is to meet him again in Washington in 1882."

Norwich, Eng., Aug. 21, 1881.

Winter Disposed of in a Summary Manner.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 27th, T. Winter speaks about "that modern lunacy called Spiritualism, which deludes its dupes with a false hope of a phantom life in the sky." And again he says, "There is not the first thing to prove that any life survives the wreck of death," and "I challenge the whole pack of Spiritualists to prove that man livs in any phase after once dead."

How does T. Winter know that there is no proof? Millions of people believe in spirit life after the death of the body, and no one can believe anything without proof. Mr. T. Winter does not believe in Spiritualism, and why? Because he has no proof. Others who hav investigated believe, because they hav proof, otherwise they could not believe. And when Mr. Winter asserts that there is no proof, to make sense it ought to mean that he knows of none, and this may be true, for his bigotry may hav prevented him from looking up the proof, and he talks very much like one who has never investigated and knows nothing about the matter.

Spontaneously and simultaneously, without collusion or concert of action, thousands of persons in this country and in other lands hav become mediums of phenomena, which hav taken the name of Spiritual phenomena, and why? Because innumerable communications from unseen intelligences, always purporting to come from departed friends, hav been received, and in this there is some proof that life survives "the wreck of death."

A bit of pencil placed between two slates produces messages purporting to come from friends who hav gone before, and the messages seem to prove that they are what they purport to be without doubt in the minds of those receiving them, and in this there would seem to be some proof.

Millions of telegrams, all agreeing on the one point that they come from the departed, would seem to be strong presumptiv proof in favor of the doctrin of continued life, and these phenomena hav not been explained or accounted for in any other way; when experts get up the force the intelligence is lacking. It is often said, I know that my friends liv, for I hav often seen and conversed with them, and they gave me indisputable evidence of their identity; and why no proof in this?

All nations and peoples who hav lived within the historic period hav, almost without exception, believed in continued life, and why? Because proof of some kind satisfied the innumerable multitudes, notwithstanding the assertions of Mr. Winter, and the verdict of the people still continues to be that a preponderance of proof is in favor of a future life. But intelligent Spiritualists do not believe in anything being supernatural. The "modern lunacy called Spiritualism" has explained much of the supernaturalism which has been believed in, and misled the people in all the ages of the past. The miracles which hav been relied on for ages to prove some things, hav mostly been explained by modern Spiritualism, and no well-informed person now believes that there ever was a miracle or ever can be.

The universal reign of law is now admitted, disposing of all miracle, and of the idea or notion that prayers were ever answered or ever will be. And all superstitions based on dreams and fables hav been disposed of in the same way, as inconsistent with the doctrin of universal law. WILLAM WATSON.

Lowellville, O., Sept. 1, 1881.

THE SACRED BROTHERHOOD, an organization of Liberals of all shades of Freethought upon the broad basis of the brotherhood of man and charity to one another, will hold their annual meeting at the town of Liberal, Mo., the only town in America intended to be entirely Liberal. Good speakers and good music will entertain the audiences, and those from abroad will find plenty to eat. They invite all Liberals to meet with them, and all orthodox who want to discuss the live issues of the day. The meetings will be held Sept. 9th, 10th, and 11th.

Around the World.—II.

A WEEK IN SCOTLAND.—CONCLUDED.

Glasgow, Tuesday morning, August 15th.—We finished up Edinburgh to-day, and returned here after 4 P.M. We visited Edinburgh Castle, the old Parliament House, the National Gallery of Paintings, the Gallery of Art, the Phrenological Museum, and Holyrood Palace. I will briefly give some of the particulars, beginning with the castle, which is perched on the top of a rock 443 feet above the water level, and is prominent in view from all parts of the city. The top of the rock contains seven acres, which are pretty well covered by the palace, the castle, and barracks-yards. The rock is nearly perpendicular on all sides, save where the entrance or esplanage is, so it is a stronghold most difficult to take by storm or by scaling. A high wall on the top of the rock incloses all save the buildings whose walls stand even with the side of the rock.

A fortification was built on this rock by the Picts as early as the fourth century; but none of the present buildings, except the quaint little old church called St. Margaret's Chapel, built in the eleventh century, were erected before the fifteenth century.

The most interesting features of the castle are the room where the crown formerly worn by the kings of Scotland and the crown jewels are kept safely secured in a large iron cage, and Queen Mary's bedroom, in which James VI. of Scotland—afterward James I. of England—was born. We looked out of the window from which, when nine days old, he was let down in a basket 250 feet. If the rope had broken, perhaps England and the world would not have lost very much. Some fine old paintings of Queen Mary adorned the walls of her room. When there was any disturbance in the country the crowned heads were quick to flee to this castle for safety. A large room, called the Parliament Room, was used for legislative purposes.

The palace looks grim and old, and in its best days was not very grand. The barracks are occupied by seven hundred soldiers, comprising a Highland regiment. When the union was formed between England and Scotland, one of the stipulations was that the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton should be garrisoned. To fulfil this contract, soldiers are still kept at each place, though far the most at Edinburgh.

We saw the soldiers drilling, and noticed that they are a fine, hardy, robust-looking set of men. They are Scotch, and were raised on oatmeal cakes. Many of them wear the Highland uniform—a kilt and naked legs. We have met Scotch soldiers in many places, often wearing the national kilt. Although the Scotch soldiers, as a general thing, look fine, I cannot say I admire their uniform. There is no beauty in a lot of men's shanks and bony legs; besides, this climate is too cold to go with the legs naked.

The Parliament House, near St. Giles's Cathedral, is occupied only by paintings and statues of Scottish notables, warriors, and statesmen. In the center of one of the rooms in the National Gallery is a fine, full-sized marble statue of Burns.

The Museum of Antiquities contains a large number of copies in plaster of Grecian and Roman statuary, the originals of which I saw last year at Naples and elsewhere. In other departments are collections of Egyptian antiquities, sculptures, terra-cottas, etc., from various countries; old Scotch wood carvings; various instruments of punishment and torture used in Scotland; "the maiden," or Scottish guillotine, by which several earls, dukes, and other notables had their heads taken off about two hundred years ago, also other Scotch antiquities.

Holyrood Palace was the former residence of the kings of Scotland, and was built over three hundred years ago. It is a rather plain, antique stone edifice, square in form, around a square court in the center, with towers, castellated elevations, etc.

The picture gallery is well filled on both sides and ends with paintings of both the fabulous and reputed kings of Scotland. One is surprised that Scotland had so many kings. These were painted two hundred years ago, and of course have an ancient appearance.

An interesting feature of the palace is Queen Mary's apartments and Lord Darnley's room. Here are the chairs used by Mary, the bed she slept upon, and other furniture used by her. The Scotch people seem to venerate her highly.

Adjoining the Palace is the Royal Chapel, in ruins, being about the fourth part of what many hundreds of years ago was Holyrood Abbey, which stood there in the form of a Greek cross, one part only of which remains. It was built in fine style for the twelfth century, but suffered severely by the calamities of war. It now has no roof, and the walls and pillars only remain. Here many of the notables of Scotland were buried, and large tablets on the wall, and others forming the floor of the chapel, bespeak their praises and valorous deeds.

Edinburgh is well supplied with monuments and statues. That of Sir Walter Scott is the most conspicuous and beautiful. The monument is of brown sandstone in the form of an open, crucial, Gothic spire, supported by four grand arches, which serves as a canopy to the fine marble statue of the author of the Waverly Novels in a sitting posture, with his favorite dog, Maida, by his side. The spire is nearly two hundred feet high, in the Gothic style, and in the numerous niches are statues of the characters in Scott's novels. The whole cost $60,000.

Near this is a fine bronze statue of Livingstone, and west of it are statues of Wilson, Black, and other distinguished Scotchmen. In St. Andrew's Square, which is beautifully laid off, and surrounded by an iron fence, stands a tall, fluted monument, 136 feet high, with a statue fourteen feet high of Henry Dundas on top. Among the other statues and monuments may be mentioned those of Pitt, Burns, Brewster, Chalmer, Charles II., George IV., Hopetown, Lord Melville, the martyrs, Nelson, North, Playfair, Prince Albert, Wellington, and the Duke of York, and also the National Monument. They are all very fine.

Edinburgh is noted for its colleges, schools, and hospitals, but I will not stop to describe them. We stepped into the Phrenological Museum, where are many hundreds of skulls of men of different nationalities, and heads of distinguished men (in plaster), among which I particularly noticed David Hume, an intellectual and benevolent head; Voltaire, deep and cunning; Burns, with poetry in excess, and also the heads of murderers and criminals. This collection was commenced by George Combe, one of the great and good men of Scotland. But I hav probably said enough about Edinburgh. It is a city of much publishing, much scholarship and reading, but not a city of manufactures and commerce like the city of Glasgow. We rode over here in eighty minutes, passing through a fine farming country, well fenced and well supplied with good farm-houses, and with teeming crops.

Scotland must be a poor country for apples. I have not seen an apple orchard in all my travels over it. Green gage plums are considerably raised, and some strawberries of large size are seen, but not of a flavor equal to ours at home. Gooseberries are the most abundant fruit, but they illy supply the place of the apples and peaches of America, which I very much miss.

Tuesday, Aug. 16th.—To-day we have made the tour of Loch Lomond, Loch Katrine, and the Trosachs, considered the most picturesque part of Scotland, and the prettiest of the Highlands. Leaving the city by rail at 7.40 A.M., we soon reached Balloch, at the foot of Loch Lomond, the most beautiful of all the Scotch lakes, where we found a steamer in waiting, which was soon bearing us up the lake, an irregular and rather narrow body of water, twenty-two miles in length, having twenty-four islands, varying in size, and surrounded by continuous, somewhat independent, green, rocky hills in the form of domes and other shapes of the most picturesque character. Rarely is more beautiful scenery found in the world. Trees are more abundant here than further north. Some of the islands are cultivated and some are mere piles of rocks, covered with grass, heather, or moss, with an occasional tree. One cultivated island, containing two or three hundred acres, is called the drunken island, because several drinking wives have been sent there by their husbands, where the women were provided with what they needed, and could eat and drink all they wanted, but from which locality they could not possibly escape. I made inquiry if there was another island where drunken men are sent, but could not learn that there was. Along the banks is an occasional fine hotel, where pleasure-seekers spend a few weeks of summer. Several from England are now here, and many more making flying visits. I also meet a goodly number of Americans—to-day Dr. Mallory and Mr. F. P. Smith, of Rochester. Everybody who visits Scotland wishes to see Loch Lomond, really a very pretty lake. On its banks Rob Roy McGregor, one of the Highland heroes, used to live, and the cave is pointed out where he and those connected with him used to hold their councils. Loch Lomond has so often been described by those who have done it so much better than I can that I will not attempt it. Some of the hills or mountains surrounding it are quite elevated. Ben Lomond, the tallest, is 2,192 feet above the lake. Many of these hills are mere hunting-grounds, kept for deer, grouse, etc. Hunting is great sport here.

The steamer landed us at Inversnaid, where we took coaches—nearly a hundred in all—and climbed some 400 feet in our five-mile ride to Loch Katrine. From this pure lake Glasgow obtains its supply of water, which is carried a distance of thirty miles or more. It is 365 feet higher than this city. It is ten miles in length, and is also a most beautiful little lake. This is where Sir Walter Scott located his "Lady of the Lake." Here on its banks we saw the house in which Helen McGregor was born. A small steamer took us the length of the lake, where coaches again awaited to convey us ten miles through "The Trosachs" to Callander, a railroad station. We stopped on the way at a fine hotel, where all took dinner who wished. The Trosachs is a long defile, glen, or continuous wide ravine, with romantic and picturesque scenery, afforded by the high hills on both sides all the way. We also passed two small lakes in the ten miles. The ride would have been very enjoyable had it not rained a slow, drizzling rain, or heavy mist, which after a while finds it way to the skin. But as we absolutely had two days without rain, we should perhaps not complain if it did rain in the Trosachs, for it passes as an adage here, "It always rains in the Trosachs."

From Callandar, a fine, well-built stone-house village, we had a two hours' ride back to Glasgow, and saw more excellent country and good crops. By way of variety we had more rain along the way, and found upon returning that Glasgow had been blessed in the same direction.

Let me now describe to you our visit to two of the largest steel works in Glasgow. The first was the establishment of I. & W. Beardmore, of Parkhead, in the outer portion of the city. Here some one or two hundred tons of cast iron are daily converted into steel by the Siemens process, which has been in use about eight years. The product is often called "soft steel," but as steel is purified iron with a certain per cent of carbon worked into it, and as this iron by the Siemens process is divested of its carbon, it is questionable whether steel is the proper term for it. Homogeneous iron is considered a more proper term. Two kinds of iron ore—one a hermatite—are used for the purpose. Ten tons are put into furnaces and kept at an intense boiling heat for ten hours. This ebullition of the iron drives off all the carbon which the ore contained. A dozen or twenty of these furnaces are built in a row, and are heated with jets of gas. It seemed curious that gas will heat furnaces better and cheaper than coal, but so it is. When the iron has been submitted long enough the contents of a furnace are drawn into a large iron pot, called a ladle, which also holds ten tons; this moves on a car or carriage for the purpose over a series of large iron molds of different sizes, some of them holding an ingot four feet long, two feet wide, and over a foot thick. The molds are thick, open at both ends, and stand upon one end, when the melted metal runs into them with all the ease imaginable. When they have stood a few hours the ingots have become sufficiently cool and sufficiently decreased in size so that the molds can be lifted from them by machinery. It is a sight when the doors of the furnace are removed to look in and see the broad surface of melted iron glowing with white heat, bubbling and boiling like a huge kettle of pudding. The light is too intense for the eyes unless protected by colored glasses, which the men make constant use of, and handed us to use for the occasion.

The ingots are next placed in heating furnaces, where they are brought to a high heat, but not enough to melt them. They are then taken out and placed under a huge steam trip-hammer, where they are pounded most unmercifully, the sparks or scales flying very freely, until the impurities are out and the metal become entirely maleable. These trip-hammers are immense institutions. There are several large ones in the works, but the most powerful of all, and perhaps in the world, is appropriately named the "Samson." The hammer and piston are in one piece of steel and weigh twelve tons. The anvil weighs forty-two tons and is placed on a solid foundation of three hundred and fifty-three tons of concrete composed of slag, bush dirt, iron borings, and Portland cement. This concrete, which has hardened into a solid mass of great firmness, tenacity, and endurence, was deposited on a bed of blue "till," lying at a great depth below the surface of the ground, the length of the block of concrete being nearly twenty-three feet, and the width over seventeen feet; on the top of this are courses of plank and iron borings alternately. Altogether the foundation for the hammer is a permanent one, and it needs to be four hundred tons; that is, the force of that number of tons falling the distance of one foot. To enable a hammer of twelve tons to strike a blow of four hundred tons the power of steam is employed. A cylinder is placed upon an iron frame immediately over the hammer and anvil, and at every blow the force of the steam upon the piston increases the blow to the amount named. It was the first time I had seen anything of the kind, and I was not a little surprised to see with what ease six or eight men with levers and the proper appliances could handle an ingot weighing three or four tons, holding it under the hammer, putting it on edge, turning it over, cutting off the ends, cutting it in pieces if necessary, and reducing it to the size and shape desired to fill orders.

The Samson hammer is capable, with a steam pressure of sixty pounds, and with an ordinary force of hands, of striking thirty blows per minute and of finishing up an ingot of two tons into slabs in seven and a half minutes. It is most remarkable how such a heavy body of steel can be so expertly and expeditiously handled in so short a space of time, but the iron trucks for carrying the hot, heavy masses, the cranes, levers suspended by chains, etc., all work effectively, and the men are masters of their business. Every motion seemed to be the proper one and not a mistake was made. It is one man's place to manipulate the hammer, and by letting on and cutting off steam to strike the heavy blows when desired and to withhold them when not needed. A large share of the work done at this establishment is rolling steel and iron plates for ocean and other steamers, boilers and similar work. For boilers and shipbuilding the Siemens steel is vastly stronger, tougher, and better than iron. For ocean steamers the plates are rolled from ten to twenty-five feet in length, four or five feet wide, and from half an inch to an inch and a half in thickness; these are bolted on the iron ribs of the ship. The plating for iron-clad war steamers has been carried to a foot and even eighteen inches in thickness, but guns, I believe, have been made powerful enough to send a ball even through this tremendous thickness of solid steel. It seems to be a still unsettled question which shall be triumphant, thick plates or heavy guns.

The ingots for the plates are heated and handled much in the same way as for the steam hammers; masses from half a ton to four tons are brought from the heating furnaces on iron trucks and passed and repassed through rollers six or seven feet in length and nearly two feet in diameter. The motion of the rollers is reversed in a moment, so that the mass is passed between the rollers back and forth, losing no time in handling. In this way a mass of two tons or more is passed between the rollers twenty or thirty times, two men bringing them nearer together with screws every time the metal passes through, until with a gage it is found to be the desired thickness, and it is carried off on the iron carriages and laid upon the stone or iron floor while still red hot. The last few times the plate is passed between the rollers dry birch twigs or brush are thrown upon the plate just before the rollers, and this causes the scales to work off and leave the plate smooth.

It is a striking scene to see in one large room scores of men handling these masses of red-hot steel, some beating it with steam hammers and several sets of rollers at work rolling the heated masses. So much heated metal of course heats up the air in the establishment not a little, and the perspiring men, flying about in all directions, look as though they might be Cyclops, and old Vulcan himself could not be otherwise than at home in this modern hades. It was also astonishing to observe with what facility the huge shears, with blades seven feet in length, will cut plates of cold steel an inch or more in thickness. Some idea of the extent of the establishment and the amount of money it takes to pay the current expenses may be had when I tell you that twelve hundred men are employed here, and considerably more than a hundred tons of steel are worked up daily.

We had an interview with one of the gentlemen of the firm. He was very polite and kind, giving us freely all the information we desired. The firm appear to be doing a flourishing business, as they certainly deserve to. They assuredly have my best wishes.

After this we visited the Steel Works of Scotland, at Newton, some six miles out of the city. These are somewhat more exsensive works than those just described, as their full quota of men is fourteen hundred. They here also manufacture steel by the Siemens process, and make steel rails for railroads on a pretty large scale. We saw them roll out several masses of steel into rails from half a ton to a ton in weight, in strings two or three hundred feet long, which were cut up in proper lengths with a large circular saw while still red hot, much as though it was stove wood. The steel for rails is made harder than that used for boilers and ship-plating. This is affected by introducing carbon while still in the furnaces. One striking feature in this establishment is the great power of its engine—300 horse-power. It has no fly-wheel, so that its motion can be reversed every half minute when the rollers are in operation. Five huge boilers make the steam for it. The shears here were still larger than seen in the first establishment, the blades of some of them being nine feet in length, and able to cut cold steel plates 1½ inches thick. Its steam hammers were also large, but I think none so powerful as the one I have described, or so perfect in workmanship. The capacity of these works is extensive, the pay-roll being about $15,000 per week, and often turning out over 150 tons of steel per day. I saw several large piles of steel made ready for America, in slabs of a certain size for rails and other purposes. Since we in America hav got to making rails pretty extensively, much less is sent over there from this side than formerly. But the iron and steel manufacture of Glasgow is immense indeed, giving altogether, employment to many thousands of men.

Glasgow has a fine public square on Queen street, in the center of which is a tall column over one hundred feet in hight, surmounted by a large statue of Sir Walter Scott. On the outside of the square are several smaller monuments and statues of Burns, Livingstone, James Watt, Peel, Wellington, and others.

The railway stations of the city are large and commodious, and all covered with thick, hammered glass plates. The public buildings are of a good character, and many of them very fine. The town has a college, libraries, and museums, but I did not take the time to visit them.

The cathedral is perhaps worthy of mention. It is not equal, of course, to many of the cathedrals on the continent; but as it was erected in the twelfth century, it may be regarded as an antiquity. It is 319 feet in length, and 63 in width. Its central tower is 225 feet high. Its crypt is somewhat noted for its fine tablets, with extensive inscriptions.

Glasgow must be admitted to be a fine business city, having in its manufactures but few superiors in the world. One fault can reasonably be found with it—there is far too much ardent spirit used here. It is the bane of the working classes. In the outer part of the city, among the mechanics and laborers, it seems as if nearly one-fourth of the buildings are occupied by "spirit merchants." Too much of the money earned by working people goes to pay for whisky and other alcoholic liquors, and the effects are seen in the barefooted and bareheaded women and children who perambulate the streets in a state of destitution. It is a great pity that the poor people of Scotland make so much use of intoxicating liquors as they do. If they would but abstain from this, much poverty and degradation would be obviated.

I omitted to mention that the people of Edinburgh are making preparations for the grand fête coming off there on the 25th inst, when the Queen will be there and review fifty thousand troops. It is thought not less than five hundred thousand people will be present.

Adrossan, Wednesday evening, August 17th.—We left Glasgow this morning for Ayr, near which old city Robert Burns was born. We visited, first of all, the Tam O'Shanter, in which, according to Burns, Tam O'Shanter and Souter Johnny used to hold their meetings. The building is a low, two-story, plastered structure, with a thatched roof, with the straw nearly a foot thick. We saw the room where they sat and the chairs they used. I ventured to take a thimbleful of sherry in the old Tam O'Shanter for Auld Lang Syne.

We walked out two miles to the cottage farm-house where Burns first saw the light. We saw the bed in which it is said he was born, and the place where the piece of wall blew in on the night the future poet made his debut into the world. The chairs also then used are still there, and the ingle, or fire-place, where his mother did the homely cooking for the family, on which fire was still burning. We were showed several original manuscripts of his poems, particularly Tam O'Shanter, and one or two others. A statue of Burns adorns the pleasant room, added to the house, in which to hold his centennial celebration, January 25, 1859.

The house is a low cottage, with a straw roof, which has evidently been repaired. A coarse plaster covers the outer and inner walls, both of which are kept whitewashed. Here, I realized, was brought into the world one of the most natural, simple, and one of the sweetest poets that ever sang, who, though he had some faults and weaknesses, was at heart a true man—really one of nature's noblemen, one of the highest works of her hand. I feel, while standing in his birthplace, a deep veneration for the memory of Burns, whose cheerful songs and poems are still sung and repeated with admiration by the people of Scotland, as well as wherever the English language is spoken. The natural outbreathings of his soul have made the world happier and better. Some of his songs are the sweetest ever penned by man, and his "Man's a Man for a' That" is grand and glorious. He believed in manhood, but despised tyranny, oppression, and cant, whether of royalty or of a hypocritical priesthood.

A little further on we came to Alloway Kirk, where Tam O'Shanter, in his midnight ride, saw the witches, and where, in making his escape, the mischievous Nannie jumped upon his mare, Meg, caught her by the tail and pulled it out. The walls of the old kirk are standing, but the roof long since took its departure. The churchyard is full of graves, and the thick, massive tombstones, many of them more than a hundred years old, tell who were buried there, with the usual poetical injunctions for the living reader to be prepared for coming death, which surely awaits him.

Still farther on stands, on an elevated plot of ground, the beautiful monument which the friends of Burns erected to his memory. The walls of the base inclose a circular room, some sixteen feet in diameter, lighted by a glass dome. On the top of the walls stand, in a circular position, eight round columns, which support the canopy, on the top of which is suitable ornamentation. A stairway leads to the observatory, under the canopy, where a fine view is had of the "bonny Doon," which placidly flows by within a few rods of the monument. The grounds surrounding the monument are most beautifully decorated with flowers and ornamental shrubbery in beds and along the gravel walks. In the rotunda of the monument is a fine marble bust of Burns, and the Bible he is said to have presented to his Highland Mary, with an assortment of Burns's mementos, and photographs kept for sale. In a room hard by are life-size statues of Tam O'Shanter and Souter Johnny sitting over their beer in gleeful conversation.

The Doon is a very pretty stream, of good size. Near the monument it is spanned by two permanent stone bridges. Not far away still live two maiden nieces of Burns. They appear about seventy years of age. They are proud of their relationship to the great poet, and cheerfully engage in conversation respecting him. They entertain a very friendly feeling toward Americans, who often visit them and bestow upon them small amounts to help them fight the battle of life.

In returning to the town of Ayr—a rather quaint, antique, solid-looking town of some fifteen or twenty thousand inhabitants—we visited the "twa brigs" (two bridges) over the river Ayr. These, it will be remembered, were the subject of one of Burns's poems. There had from time immemorial been the plain solid old bridge spanning the Ayr.

> "Auld Brig appeared, of ancient Pictish race,
> The very wrinkles Gothic in his face;
> He seemed as he wi' time had wrastled lang,
> Yet, teughly doure, he bade an unco bang."

Finally it was determined to build a new bridge a square below, and it was ornamented and decorated with carvings, etc.

> "New Brig was buskit in a braw new coat,
> That he at London frae ane Adams got;
> In's hand five taper staves, as smooth's a bead,
> Wi' virls and whirligigums at the head."

The old bridge of course was jealous, and Burns made them hold a dialogue together. Finally the old bridge, in utter disgust with the young upstart, says:

> "Conceited gowk! puffed up wi' windy pride!
> This mony a year I've stood the flood and tide;
> And tho' wi' crazy eild I'm sair forfain,
> I'll be a brig when ye're a shapeless cairn."

Here, you notice, was a distinct prophecy. The old bridge predicted that while he himself stood fast and firm the new bridge would become a shapeless mass. The prophecy proved true; the fine new bridge some years after fell a shapeless mass into the Ayr, and another bridge was built in its place, which still stands. The old one, too, is still on duty, and I walked upon it. Here was one of the most remarkable fulfilments of prophecy that I have ever met with, and in my opinion it surpassed Isaiah and Jeremiah in this line altogether. The room was pointed out to me, still standing beside the Ayr between the two bridges, in which Burns hurriedly wrote the poem of "The Brigs of Ayr." On the Wallace Tower, built upon the remains of the fortifications which Cromwell caused to be built, is still the clock which Burns mentioned.

The country about Ayr is pretty and productive. By conversing with farmers and others we learned that good land turns out fifty bushels of wheat, eighty to one hundred bushels of oats, weighing forty-five to fifty-five pounds per bushel, and from two to three hundred bushels of potatoes per acre. The land is kept well fertilized, and the very frequent rains bring out the crops to the land's fullest capacity, and the moist, cool weather causes the grains to ripen slowly and plumply. The prices of farm crops here run about as follows: Hay, $26.00 per ton; oats, $1.75 per bushel; wheat, about $2.00 per bushel. Good sheep are from $10.00 to $12.00 per head; steers, three years old, and cows, from $100.00 to $125.00; and horses from $1.00 to 500.00. These prices may seem high to American farmers, but it must be remembered that farmers here have to pay a rent of from $12.00 to as high as $50.00 and $60.00 per acre. The average rents, hereabouts, are $15.00 to $20.00. I have seen a few apple and pear trees in this vicinity, or rather the vicinity of Ayr, with a profusion of beautiful flowers everywhere. It is a matter of some surprise to me how flowers can bloom so beautifully and so bountifully where the weather is so cool and there is so little sun.

I must say a word about the fences on the farms and by the roadsides. Hereabouts they are principally stone, and by the roadside are laid in mortar and as smoothly and with as much care as though the wall of a house; and often they are high, frequently five and six feet. I have sometimes, as in the case of an old curmudgeon who wished to shut himself away from the gaze of passers by, noticed walls even ten feet high, especially in the outskirts of the villages. They are made so square and smooth that a boy could scarcely climb over them. I do not like these high walls all along the roadway; they are of course permanent, but they look cold, cheerless, and forbidding. When a person is walking along country roads, he wishes to look over into the fields and see the crops, and the sheep and cattle feeding, and not feel as though he was in the corridor of a prison.

I must give the farmers of this country the credit of keeping their fields very clean and free from weeds. I have hardly seen a single weed in the hundreds of miles I have traveled over this country. It cannot be possible that weeds grow so rapidly in this country as America, but farming is attended to far more carefully here than there.

We have not seen the central part of Scotland, but have surrounded it and taken a pretty thorough view of it. We are now about to leave it, and a few words of its people may not be amiss. I must say then, that I like the Scotch people very much indeed; they are honest, earnest, industrious, frugal, genial, and reasonably happy. Perhaps they are a trifle grave and matter-of-fact people, but they are thorough-going, plodding, persistent, and successful, or they could not have succeeded in this country as they have.

The Lowlands are a good farming country, but the Highlands, as you have doubtless inferred, are rocky and sterile. But had the country a warm, genial, and sunny climate, Scotland would be a delightful place. I fear I should never become an admirer of Scottish mists and rains. We have now passed eight days in this country; two days it did not rain, but one of them was raw and cold. Such coldness of the air in August I cannot like. We have had some hours that seemed pleasant, but we have not had an hour that we would call even moderately warm in our country. The most of the time an overcoat has not been uncomfortable.

I will also say a word more about the ladies. I disparaged their looks a trifle, but I must say that to-day I have seen several, if not pretty, at least good-looking women, and they all have a remarkably fresh, rosy, healthy look. Some of the young girls have too red cheeks, looking as though the skin had all been rubbed off. I have met several large people, but very few fat ones, and very few unreasonably thin and emaciated, and no indications of biliousness. I should say the people generally enjoy better health here than in America.

I have said nothing about the bagpipes of Scotland. I have heard them on several occasions, both in the front of soldiers on the march and on other occasions. The noise they make may cheer a Highlander, but it would not me.

We are now on the steamer Northwest, at Adrossan, and at 11 P. M. will steam out for Belfast, where we will find ourselves in the morning. I will bid good-bye to Scotland and good-night to you.

D. M. B.

Around the World.—III.

SIX DAYS IN IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Aug. 19, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS: We left Adrossan at 11 P. M. Wednesday night, and had a smooth passage across the Irish Sea to Belfast, arriving about daylight yesterday morning, finding ourselves in Old Ireland "for sure." Breakfast was the first thing to be attended to, for which the hotel keeper had the assurance to charge us three shillings each (75 cents), and then we looked about the town and found it to be a well-built city with fine stores, good public buildings, and neat, wide streets, with a population of 212,000. This is the seat of the linen manufacture in Ireland and the greatest place for the business in the world. The linen mills and warehouses are large, tall, and imposing buildings, five and six stories high, and present a peculiarly neat appearance for manufactories; there are a large number of them.

I early made it my business to call upon Mr. John Montgomery, manager of the Falls Flax Spinning Company's works, and whom, in company with Mr. James Kirkpatrick, I met on the continent last year, traveling with them from Brussels to Cologne, thence to Bohn, then up the Rhine, stopping together over night at Bohn, looking the town over together, and again at Bingen on the Rhine, and then on to Mayence, where we parted. I found them very genial, pleasant gentlemen, such companions as one likes to fall in with when on a journey, as well as at other times. I resolved if ever I visited Belfast to call upon them. We found Mr. Montgomery busy at work at flax spinning, or rather superintending six hundred employees. He seemed glad to see me, and I am quite sure I was glad to see him. I learned that Mr. Kirkpatrick was away on a tour in Switzerland, so I will not be able to see him, which I have cause to regret. Mr. Montgomery kindly showed us over his establishment, and now I fancy I will be able to tell you a little something about flax-spinning. We first visited the large store-room where the flax is deposited when brought in from the growers or from the continent, Belgium, and elsewhere, for only about half the flax manufactured in Belfast is grown in Ireland. The Flemish flax is put up with more care and in better style than the Irish, and perhaps is quite as fine in quality. There was probably one or two hundred tons of flax in the large store-room. The first process is hatcheling and hackling, by which process the flax is thoroughly combed, divested of any remaining shives or particles of the stock or woody portion of the plant. It is also divested of the tow, the disarranged fibers of the flax. This hackling was formerly done by hand, and was a laborious, unpleasant task to perform; but now it is done by a large, complicated, and expensive machine, called the hackler. Hanks or twists of the flax after being opened and passed a few times through a hatchel are placed into metal clamps at the center, and are entered in the hackler one clamp following another, some ten or twelve feet, the length of the machine. These clamps drop down in sections, so that the flax passes between combs of steel needles, which comb and straighten the flax most beautifully, the tow dropping on the floor under the machine, and used for coarser purposes. These sections of the clamps move along in the machine and drop again and again between the combs, which grow finer and finer as they advance, so that at the end of the hackler the flax is most thoroughly combed, every fiber lying perfectly straight and almost as soft as silk. The hanks, twists, or whatever they are called, are then reversed and the other end or half passes through the machine and receives the same amount of combing or hackling. This process greatly improves the appearance of the flax. It is then taken into another room where some twenty or thirty men are busily engaged in assorting the flax that has been hackled, separating it according to fineness and quality, and deciding which shall be for warp and which for the woof or filling, the warp requiring the best material and the hardest twisting. The men who work at hatcheling, hackling, and assorting necessarily have to breathe in constantly the fine dust of the flax with which the rooms are filled; this unavoidably affects the lungs, and after a few years they are greatly afflicted with pulmonary diseases, which of course abbreviate their lives.

After being thus assorted by skilful judges the flax passes through other complicated machines which I fear I cannot describe, in which the flax is compressed by rollers and by running through a series of these machines is drawn out in loose, coarse, untwisted treads, and wound on large spools, holding each perhaps two or three pounds of flax. A large room, 200 feet by 75, is filled with these machines, which press, refine, and draw out the flax preparatory to spinning. These machines are attended by women, from girls thirteen years of age to the gray-haired matrons who have spent a lifetime at this employment. On the two next floors above, in rooms of the same size, are the spinners; these are long, complicated machines having 480 spindles each. A girl attends to two of the spinners, or 960 spindles (if I am not mistaken). This spinning is done by the damp process, the flax passing through warm or hot water, and the entire room being filled with steam, almost like a vapor bath. The coarse, loose yarn prepared in the preceding room is in the spinner stretched out twelve or fourteen times its length and twisted to the requisite degree of hardness. It is marvelous how fine and even the threads are made, and with what dexterity the spinning girls manipulate the business; the fine threads very often break in the process, and it is astonishing to see how quick they will mend it and the spindle be made to resume its work. As the spinning is done the thread is wound upon small spools or bobbins, which in other machines in other rooms is put on large spools and in large reels wound off in knots and hanks or skeins, each knot and each hank having just the right number of threads. In the reeling little bells tell when the right number of threads is made up, and everything moves like clock-work. In another room the warp is prepared by a machine winding from hundreds of large spools at a time, enough to make a piece of linen a yard and a quarter or a yard and a half in width. The threads pass through a reel of the proper degree of fineness, are wound evenly on large iron rollers with flanges at the ends like a spool, and then are put into the looms for weaving. I forget how many thousands of feet of thread is put upon one of the large iron rollers, but the number is very large, and the weight of thread must be very great. The process of weaving is much the same as with cotton and woolen goods.

The men work by the pound at hatcheling, hackling, straightening out, etc. By constant effort they make between five and six dollars per week. A part of the women work by the day and a part by piece-work, and make two dollars per week. The women who do the reeling sometimes earn, if very expert, $2.50 per week. And here they spend their lives, many of the employees having grown old in the service. The dusty part must be very unhealthy, and the hot steam, especially in cold weather, must be very exposing; the contrast in the air, without and within, must be very great. Although many of the girls looked healthy, I noticed they did not hav the rosy cheeks, fine straight forms, and full busts of the bonnie Scotch lassies. Working constantly in heated air is very unlike the free, pure air among the hills of Scotland.

The engine which runs the establishment is a very large one—three hundred horse-power, with a thirty foot walking-beam, four and a half foot cylinder, and seven foot stroke, supplied with steam by three large boilers. The power is far more than is required, it originally being designed for an additional mill.

The number of employees in the Falls Flax Spinning Company is six hundred. In some establishments are double the number. In and about Belfast thirty thousand women are employed in the linen manufacture, besides the men. When the linen trade is good times are good in Belfast, employers, manufacturers, and shopkeepers all flourishing; but when there is a depression in the trade everybody suffers. In the time of our civil war, when cotton could hardly be had, the linen trade was remarkably good, and many fortunes were made in Belfast.

Accompanied by Mr. Montgomery, we next visited the manufacturing establishment of Combe, Barbour, and Combe, the manufacturers of the hacklers, spinners, and all the other machinery connected with the spinning of flax and the manufacture of linen, which is a very extensive establishment. It covers eight acres of ground, employs fourteen hundred men, and turns out nearly a million dollars worth of work per annum. Its weekly pay-roll is over $5,000. To giv some idea of the extent of its business and the cost of conducting it it may be stated that the tools and machines used in the establishment are themselves worth $3,000,000. Machinery for the manufacture of linen is peculiar, and is not gotten up to any extent save in this establishment. Extensive orders are being filled from Belgium, Russia, America, and other parts of the world. I saw $200,000 worth of the machinery packed ready for shipment to Barbour Brothers, Paterson, N. J.—brothers to the Mr. Barbour of this establishment, and who formerly lived in Belfast. The full advantage is taken in this manufactory of performing the hundreds of kinds of work done by the appliances of machinery and the making of the almost innumerable parts of the many machines has necessitated the making of many expensive machines and tools, and that is why the aggregate of the tools is so large. Of course lathes, planers, etc., are used in great numbers. We saw ninety lathes in one room, with several large ones in other rooms. The forging is all done by machinery, many trip-hammers of various sizes being constantly at work, one of which was made in America; it strikes more rapidly and does more execution than others of its size. The foundry for castings of iron and brass is very extensive, and is similar to other foundries. We had some conversation with Mr. Barbour, who principally directs and manages the entire establishment, and found him a very pleasant gentleman. We were shown over the establishment by Mr. James Megannety. The work is not all performed in one building, of course, but rather a series of buildings; and a narrow-gage railway for hand-cars connects all together for conveying work and stock from one part of the establishment to another, also from one part of the same building to another. A mile and a half of this railway track is in use and saves a great amount of heavy carrying. As it must be readily seen, as the manufacture of linen machinery cannot be engaged in except at a very heavy expenditure of money, this firm is likely to have very little competion in any part of the world, and they must continue to be the manufacturers of this class of machinery for all nations. They take the greatest pains with all the work they turn out, and every machine is tested by practically working the flax before it leaves the establishment; thus if any defect exists in it it is detected before it is shipped. While looking through this extensive establishment I was fully impressed with the fact that Ireland can do some things as well as other countries. The engine for this establishment is necessarily of large power and runs very smoothly, and the machinery is all operated by leather ropes or round belts, no cog-work or flat belts being used.

After this the two gentlemen, Messrs. Montgomery and Megannety, took us in a carriage out to the cemeteries, the park, and the suburbs of the town on the west. The cemetry is on somewhat elevated ground, and affords a charming view of the Lagan valley and the adjacent country, with the Black Hills on the north and the Castlereagh Hills to the south, including in the valley several villages, manufactories, and hundreds of farms, each looking at its very best. I have seldom seen a more beautiful prospect. The cemetery is laid off with excellent taste, and is ornamented with a profusion of lovely flowers in full bloom. The cemetery visited is but fifteen or twenty years old, and its monuments are all modern and beautiful. The rich people of Belfast have evidently vied with each other as to which shall have the prettiest monument in the cemetery and the most nicely improved lot. In the rear part of the grounds is ample room for the poor, to whom burial room is given gratis; but few or no fine tombstones or monuments are raised over their graves.

The ride over, Mr. Montgomery took us to his very comfortable house, where a fine dinner awaited us. His hospitality is of the genuine character, and when he visits New York, if ever, I shall feel under obligations to show him corresponding attention.

This part of Ireland was largely settled by Scotch people, consequently the Catholic element is in much smaller proportion here than in most parts of the island, estimated to be here about one-third part of the population. Of the one hundred places of worship, thirty-four are Presbyterian, nineteen Episcopal, nineteen Methodist, seven Catholics, six Unitarians, three Independents, two Baptists, and ten assorted.

The town has grown rapidly in population and wealth for an old country. In 1821 it contained 37,000; in 1851, 120,777; in 1881, 212,000. The commerce of the town has also grown in proportion to its population. The city stands at the lower point of a commodious bay and upon the river

Lagan. Large numbers of sailing vessels and steamers come into this port. The manufactures of the town are large, other goods being manufactured here besides linen. One million of spindles are pretty constantly spinning linen, and brocade and damask goods of various kinds are manufactured largely. One pretty large establishment was pointed out to us which is wholly employed in manufacturing for the New York market, and perhaps for the house of Stewart & Co.

At 3:20 P.M. we took the train for Dublin and found it a very pleasant ride. We passed through a most fertile country teeming with luxuriant crops, which seemed better and more abundant than we have yet seen. We saw comparatively little mountain or hill land, and what was seen is not covered with trees as in America, but with heather as in Scotland; the same is sometimes seen on the lowlands unfit for cultivation, of which, however, there is but a small percentage. The land is generally gently rolling, often approaching a level, for miles together. We passed several pieces of land where the residents were securing their winter's firewood, or rather their fuel for both winter and summer, called turf, but really peat, a vegetable formation of decayed leaves, wood, and fibers, in low, wet fields called bogs. The peat is cut out in square pieces, about the size of a brick, then piled loosely in small lots to dry, when it is stacked in very much larger quantities. This is burnt in grates, etc., much like coal, but does not last half so long. It is most fortunate that Ireland produces the peat in profuse quantities, otherwise the people would inevitably suffer for the want of fuel, for she has no coal, and firewood is entirely out of the question. Scarcely a tree is to be seen but what has been planted and, cultivated and not even a stick, or quarter-grown tree, can be cut by a tenant but what the owner through his overseer will demand and secure payment. Formerly it was the rule to evict a tenant guilty of cutting anything in the way of a tree, however small, but the law has been changed so that the tenant can remain by paying the value of the tree cut. The peat strata are variable in thickness, running from one foot to ten, the average being perhaps four feet. I have seen a hundred acres of this turf or peat grounds together, though often not more than one-fourth of that amount are seen together. The land was originally swampy and is still too much so to cultivate. The holes whence the peat is taken are generally partly filled with water. The peat on the ground is worth about three shillings and sixpence per cartload, which is about eighty-five cents in our money. When delivered in towns it is correspondingly higher, though not as much so as might be supposed. When dry it is light, about half the weight of hard wood. This peat is used principally by the lower classes, as the better classes—small in proportion—especially in the cities, use coal brought from England and Wales. I have been told that coal is found in the southern part of Ireland, but for some reason the mines are not worked.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 10, 1881.

THE Hornellsville Convention closed Sunday night with a very able address by Mr. Wakeman. We shall next week giv as full report of the meeting as we can find room for. The whole five days were pleasantly spent, and although the attendance was not so large as was hoped for, the enthusiasm and earnestness were marked. The Association will meet at Watkins next year.

THE demand for the papers containing Mr. Bennett's first and second letters on his tour Round the World has been so great that the supply—of which we had an extra quantity—is exhausted. We shall try to print enough hereafter to meet the demand, and would say to those who hav written and cannot obtain the paper that they will do well to subscribe for the books which are to be sent to all sending in their V's. The volumes will be dedicated to those remitting before the first volume is published.

THE remainder of Mr. Bennett's very interesting letter from Ireland arrived just too late for this issue, but will appear in our next.

A Letter from California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What an inspiring sight is this magnificent march of humanity, to the sweet and harmonious strains of liberty's music, the music that thrills and fills the soul of every loyal and royal Freethinker! A leader in that march has departed for a tour around the globe in the interests of the human race, a leader true and tried, one whom the Christian bigots and fanatics thought to crush to earth. But he livs to triumph, livs to carry the banner of intellectual freedom all over the wide world. The principles which he advocates, and for which he was ready and willing to offer up his life, are the principles of truth, based on reason and liberty, based on justice. They will triumph and with their triumph the name of D. M. Bennett will shine bright among the immortal hosts of freedom.

But are we not shaking the citadels of that accursed thing called Christianity, that l'Infâme, as Voltaire called it, which has caused this earth for over 1,800 years? And we are doing it in such a quiet, unostentatious way that I glory in being one of the obscure instruments in its destruction. We hav no inhuman butcheries connected with our triumphs over "the infamous," no priests singing songs at the sight of blood, and no Loyolas granting edicts to burn and butcher innocent souls. Ours are the victories of peace, the triumph of reason over superstition, of mercy over brutality. We reason and argue, we sow the seed, and we are as confident that the harvest of free souls will come as we are that we breathe. All we hav to do is to keep sowing the seed, be patient, and the crop of Christians will, in time, be gloriously short.

I am glad to know that George Chainey is so successful in his Boston lectures. His fame is spreading here and we hope one day to see him in this paradise by the Pacific. Mr. Chainey is a splendid specimen of a free soul that has thrown aside the galling servitude of Christism. I see several other ministers are leaving "the fold" of the good shepherd, like Chainey, and coming out into the radiant world of intellectual freedom. These Christian ministers who are boldly thinking for themselvs deserve the fellowship of all Freethinkers. Christianity does not allow a man to think for himself, and when he has the heroic spirit to do so, he is spit upon and hounded with charteristic Christian malice. Well, all such men are sure of a hearty welcome into the paradise of Freethought.

This week I had a pleasant chat with two of your old subscribers here, Dr. Hardcastle and H. Berenz, Esq. Dr. Hardcastle is an English gentleman and combines therewith that easy and natural manner so peculiar to Californians by adoption. Mr. Berenz is a Jewish-American, and was, I think, a bondsman for Mr. Bennett at the time that the unclean firm of Comstock, Benedict & Co., sought to destroy him. Berenz is a big-brained, big-hearted Freethinker and a true type of the loyal, progressiv, and liberty-loving American Israelite.

In unison with all Freethinkers I wish Mr. Bennett a triumphant voyage and safe return.

That "Christian Hero."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I was much amused at Jamieson's account of this personage in the last Truth Seeker, but I assure you (the Christian hero's advertising sheet having been also sent to me) that Bro. Jamieson has not quoted the funniest part. I allude to the Christian hero's argument, of which I will giv you an outline. His theory is contained in a book called "The Problem of Human Life," and to advertise the same a paper has been started yclept the Literary Microcosm, from which I get my idea of the book. About half this paper is given to the notices of other Christian papers, which, as you know, are rich. The other half is made up of selections and abridgments of the book, which you shall see are richer. The Christian hero, or Mr. Wilford Hall, which is a simpler term, selects for his point of attack on "materialistic" science the undulatory theory of sound. And certainly if he can demolish this he will hav knocked a hole in the inductiv philosophy that cannot easily be patched. Now let us see how he goes at it. The theory is first stated thus: "The intensity or loudness of any sound diminishes as the square of the distance from the sounding body precisely as the quantity of air increases." The words in italics contain a gross blunder. The quantity of air, supposing its density to be uniform, increases as the cube of the diameter, and not as the square of the radius. Thus at a radius of two feet the intensity of the sound is one-quarter what it is at one foot; but the volume of air is eight times as great. Mr. Hall evidently imagins that the diminution in intensity of sound depends on the increase in the weight of air to be moved; but this is quite a mistake; it depends on the superficial area over which the action is diffused, and which varies as the square of the radius. For this reason the law applies to forces, like gravitation and radiant heat, which are capable of being propagated through empty space, where there is no weight of air to be moved at all. This is the meaning of the following statement by Prof. Tyndall, which the blunderer Hall quotes, but has wholly misunderstood:

"You hav, I doubt not, a clear mental picture of the propagation of the sound from our exploding balloon through the surrounding air. The wave of sound expands on all sides, the motion produced by the explosion being thus diffused over a continually augmenting mass of air. It is perfectly manifest that this cannot occur without an enfeeblement of the motion. Take the case of a shell of air of a certain thickness with a radius of one foot, reckoned from the center of explosion. A shell of air of the same thickness, but of two feet radius, will contain four times the quantity of matter; if its radius be three feet, it will contain nine times the quantity of matter; if four feet it will contain sixteen times the quantity of matter, and so on. Thus the quantity of matter set in motion augments as the square of the distance from the center of the explosion. The intensity or loudness of the sound diminishes in the same proportion" (Lectures on Sound, p. 10, quoted and commented upon p. 152 of the Problem of Human Life).

You see Tyndall speaks of the quantity of air in the shell itself, while Hall understands him to mean that contained in the hollow of the shell. This is only the beginning of Hall's blunders. In the same article we hav the following amazing demonstration:

"If the sound decreases as the square of the distance, beginning at one foot from the instrument, then it decreases at the same ratio beginning at any other distance from the instrument you may choose. For example, at one hundred feet from the instrument the sound is of a certain intensity. You can begin there, if you choose, and if the principle be correct, the sound must decrease from that point onward as the square of the distance the same as if the sounding body extended out one hundred feet, and had that much less intensity. This being indisputably so, let us suppose a station at a distance from the steam siren of ten miles lacking one hundred feet, and let us call this the inner station. Let us now use feet for the unit, as at first, and see what must be the unavoidable decrease of this sound in traveling through these one hundred feet. Watch the figures. At one foot from this inner station the calculation commences. At two feet from it the sound is one-fourth as loud as at the first foot. At three feet it is one-ninth as loud. At ten feet it is one-hundredth as loud; and at one hundred feet (ten miles from the siren) it is one-10,000th as loud. Thus the sound must decrease within this one hundred feet 10,000 fold; or, in other words, must be 10,000 times as loud at one foot from the inner station as it is one hundred feet farther away!"

Here our lunatic friend forgets entirely that the intensity of the sound decreases as the square of the radius, and coolly assumes that it must decrease as the square of the distance from any arbitrary point! He deliberately creates a transparent absurdity, and then imputes it to men, who, if they heard it, would smile, and bid him go back to common school.

In all this, so far, there is nothing very new. Every man of science who has the misfortune to be generally known receives reams of letters from people who propose to upset some fundamental truth—gravitation is a favorit object of attack—and like poor Hall usually succeed at once in making it evident that they do not understand what they are writing about. But from another point of view the career of the Christian hero is interesting. The orthodox papers which indorsed him hav given themselvs away worse than when they slobbered over Joe Cook, for he has thrown himself right into the inexorable clutches of mathematics, which Joe, in his maddest, merriest moods, was sane enough to keep away from. But worst of all is the fact—if it be a fact—that the college professors are among his admirers. These men—Christians, of course—took the accepted theory on trust without an attempt to verify it, and formed a college which judged them worthy to teach without the mathematical knowledge necessary to see through such blunders as the above. Could there be a sadder commentary on the superficiality of learning in Christian institutions? The names of these men and their colleges deserve to be published. They are Prof. Kephart, Western College, Iowa; L. M. Osborne, Madison University, Hamilton, N. Y. (not Madison, Wisconsin, thank the gods!); and Dr. Adams, Wesleyan University, Bloomington, Ill.

Aphorisms.

by levi north.

The object of all investigation is the attainment of truth.

Truth has no respect for prejudices, none for the authority of great names, none for traditions, none for precedent, none for opinions whose claim to truth rests upon the willingness of those who entertain them to die in their defense. A million of martyrdoms cannot establish, nor even tend to establish, the smallest truth.

The genuin seeker after truth must be as willing to cast off old and erroneous opinions and receive new truths in their place as he would be to part with an old coat and put on a new and better one.

It is not necessary that a new truth should be substituted for every error that is discarded. It may be sufficient to deny and discard the error.

There are some errors of morals and religion which should be replaced with truths. But before truth can be fully substituted for them they must be torn down and removed.

No erroneous opinion can be of advantage to men.

It is better to hav no opinion upon a given subject than to hav one which is erroneous.

That which is above our capacity to understand does not concern us, and we need hav no opinion concerning it.

Men are under no obligation to hav any opinion upon all questions about which opinions are sometimes entertained or asked.

Let us acknowledge our ignorance at the precise point where it begins.

The moment we step into darkness or doubt, or rely upon tradition, or the authority of great names, our ground is uncertain, and our opinions without any definit value.

There are many conclusions logically drawn from defectiv or unfounded premises. Such conclusions are worthless. The first step in a safe chain of reasoning is to establish the truth of the premises. The most of men can reason well enough to reach a correct conclusion from given premises, but few of them, however, can be relied upon to determin if these premises are perfectly established. Nearly all the errors in men's beliefs hav arisen from overlooking or disregarding errors in the premises or foundations of those beliefs.

In judging men we must not hold them so much responsible for the correctness of their opinions as for the honesty with which they entertain them. Frown upon hypocrisy, for it is cowardly and dishonest. Better is the man who is honestly in error than he who hypocritically pretends to believe even the truth.

Whoever demands my concurrence in his beliefs has no respect for my natural rights. He is no nearer honest than the robber who demands my purse; and not many years ago he was quite as dangerous and more cruel.

The most cruel thing in the world was the odium theologicum, and church partisanship is still as full of hatred and cruelty as the statutes will let it be.

I hav not much respect for those men whose opinions are set between quotation points. They seem to hold these little points of the greatest consequence of anything about an opinion, much as some people consider the frame as giving the principal value to a picture.

The Truth About the Jersey City Police.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: When having so happy a call with you last Thursday morning, how little we thought the bright sun would set on my head in a cell unfit to receive a vagrant dragged from the ditch! But such fates belong to the crisis—wars between liberty and the tyrannies.

The assault I suffered that day at Jersey City was wholly unprovoked—had not a slight apology. The ignorant man of the badge seemed to think his displeasure at the style of my raiment justified him in any treatment. He was astonished when the sergeant asked him what he meant, and as soon as he got me locked in the station he fled and could not be found. The other officers, the reporters and editors, thinking women and citizens, saw there was no occasion for disturbing me; yet the papers, while giving my true statements, could, for selfish reasons, falsify and make light remarks, evidently wishing to show me at fault and to teach other women they will meet foes if they attempt to decide their own course.

Men are encouraged in their tyranny and continue a cruel mastery because women are so readily subjected—so slow to use the few rights they hav. The most intelligent part of them, yielding their health and usefulness to the fashion bondage, because of the effort to resist pretense and vicious usage, are aiding the powers that shake chains in their faces and mock their tears with dregs of anguish. They know their sinning weakness; thousands of them hav been confessing it in this summer's tour of mine, and a few hav shown practical grit. For the rest I may hav to look on the grates again.

Sham arrests of dress reformers hav long been practiced as a scare, and are doubtless commenced on me to prevent my influence among women, as the fling at women's rights and their public work testifies. This line of Comstockism, smiting individuals that Liberal institutions may be weakened, has been endured till women, as well as men, should face it with bravery and power. That it will be suffered till it is thus faced is evident.

Women, what crater are you sleeping over? Has the spirit of freedom that glorified your sires perished on the rack of style? This trial crisis of all tyrannies, now in operation, must come to a close with liberty lost or saved. The latter cannot be effected till, with renewed strength and high purpose, you act your part in the conquest. Only so can men be fully empowered. Only by the forces of both united in the right are nations or planets redeemed. I scorn condescension to vile officers, clans, trades, and customs, but am willing to be humanity's Faithful servant, Mary E. Tillotson.

MRS. TILLOTSON'S ASSAULT.

From the Jersey City Argus.

Jersey City, Aug. 26th.

To the Editor of the Argus, Dear Sir: To prevent misunderstanding respecting the assault made on my person yesterday in this city I spare time to make correct statements.

On the way to my Vineland home I called here to communicate with people on the topic of health and the methods of obtaining it. I engaged lodging at the Philadelphia hotel and went about my work. A little before sunset Policeman Finlay accosted me with the query, "Are you a woman or a man?" I replied. "Look at me calmly and you will need no answer." He said, "You had best go and see the marshal." I rejoined, "I hav no business with him; if he has with me he can go to my hotel." I passed on, leaving him and about a dozen little children whom I hoped he would send to their homes. A few of them seeing him pursue me instead of them, followed across to the corner, but were not noisy as the police account stated; there was not the shadow of uproar and no confusion but what he caused. The first that I knew of his following he pulled my sleeve and said, "You must go with me." I said, "I cannot obey, sir; you are wrong; to obey would be to abet that wrong, which is not in my will or power to do." He seized my arm and started, which turned my feet on their sides, and I fell. He took one of my arms and told a man to take the other, and they attempted to either drag or walk me, but I folded my feet under my skirt and they lugged me to the station, while I assured the poor police he was placing himself in my power. The sergeant asked him what he meant, and with hesitancy he stammered "disorderly person." He then ordered me to deliver up my things, and I said: "Is not this abuse enough without robbing me of my property? I will not aid such evil," and I held my hands over my pockets. He held my hands in one of his while he took my watch, chain, brooch, portemonnaie, and even a loose dime from the skirt pocket, which with shawl, umbrella, and reticule of books he passed to the sergeant. They asked my name. I told them, but saw they could not spell it. Asked where my home was; I said, "In New Jersey when here." Asked my occupation; I said I do anything I wish to, but I am not obliged to answer you, for it cannot be shown that I hav been out of order; asked my age, a man answered sixty. They told me to go to another room.

I said, "Unless I can know it is where I ought to go I cannot go." Two of them took my arms and carried me to a cell. Hearing them bolt the solid door I asked how long they would hold me there. They said, "Till morning." I looked around in surprise, feeling unable to endure it. Grated windows were before me for the first time, and the dirt was intolerable. The size of the place was about 5x10. One hard chair, a rude cot bedstead (the canvas on it rent lengthwise, so that a body would fall through), a foul slop-pail, a rat-hole in the smeared floor, and great cracks in the corner of the broken wall completed the view. After awhile some kind-faced men raised the sash opening to the first room, and I complained of the utter cruelty of my detention. They said they would see if the judge could be found that night, and soon consoled me with such a hope.

After eight o'clock he came and heard my story, said there was no cause of arrest, and, with manly words, invited me to call on him this morning and he would consider the matter of redress. Finlay could not be found. My valuables were returned, and I asked for a decent man, who was not covered with badges of office, to show me the way to my hotel, and the marshal gave his service.

I intend to see the judge again, converse with the mayor, and try to turn some light into the darkness of this part of the city, which I came into because it was commended as the best part.

For justice and human weal, Mary E. Tillotson.

Report of the Lawrence (Mich.) Meeting.

The annual meeting of the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Van Buren and adjoining counties was held on the Fair Grounds in the village of Lawrence, Mich., commencing on Saturday, Aug. 6th, at 3 o'clock P. M., with L. S. Burdick in the chair. The afternoon was devoted to conference and short speeches.

Sunday morning the genial face of our president was visible in the chair, and all nature was radiant with smiles, while a free Methodist camp-meeting in session two or three miles distant was the center of attraction for superficial minds, leaving us with a comparativly small audience of solid, thinking men and women, whose wrapt attention gave evidence that they were interested in our beautiful philosophy of life.

The morning session was occupied by A. B. French, of Clyde, O., in a short seeech, followed by Mrs. M. C. Gale, of North Lansing, Mich., in a speech of one hour. Her voice also rang out in sweet tones of soul-inspiring music, making the grand old woods echo with her songs. At the close of the morning session the following-named persons were elected as officers for the ensuing year, to wit: for President, L. S. Burdick, Kalamazoo; Vice-President, Mrs. R. A. Sheffer, South Haven; Secretary, W. J. Dennis, Breedsville; Treasurer, Miss L. B. Bangs, Paw Paw. An intermission was then taken for dinner and social greetings until 2 o'clock, when Mrs. Gale gave an address of half an hour on the "Law of Compensation," after which A. B. French gave the concluding address, contrasting the God of theology with that of science and Liberalism. The most perfect harmony prevailed, and each seemed to vie with the other in contributing to the "feast of reason and flow of soul" that seemed to pervade the atmosphere and fill the hearts of all with good cheer.

The next meeting is to be held at South Haven, the first Saturday and Sunday of November.

E. L. WARNER, Secretary,

Cain's Wife.—Who Was She?

BY J. C. N. ABBOTT.

So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God said unto them, be fruitful, multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it, and hav dominion over the fish of the sea and over the fowls of the air, and over everything that moveth upon the earth. And God said, Behold, I hav given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.—Gen. i, 27, 29.

And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And there was not a man found to till the ground. And the Lord God formed a man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul.—Gen. ii, 2, 5, 7.

The questions hav been often asked during the past five thousand years, Who was Cain's wife? From what stock did she spring? Who were her parents? Was she a sister of Cain of whom no record or genealogy whatever is given? And how came she in the land of Nod, where Cain found her and took her to wife?

All these seem to be pertinent questions, and mankind has sought for some rational solution of them for the entire time given as the age of the world, or at least since the time when Cain got married.

And it is believed that wise theologians, great and grave doctors of divinity, antiquarians, and the curious of all ages, hav wrestled with this question, and they hav endeavored to render some solution of it which might stop the mouths of those inquisitiv and sacrilegious people who are ever prone to be prying into those mysteries which God did not deem best to reveal to them in the past ages of the world's progress.

But now in the present age of progress and of light and knowledge, and after we hav so satisfactorily solved the knotty problem, all people are left to wonder why they could not, or did not, see it before, so simple is it. Now all appears plain, and the people are resting in the belief—yea, the assurance—that Mrs. Cain had a legitimate origin, whose ancestry hav a history which antedates that of her illustrious husband, with all his ancestors. This announcement, we are aware, will strike the world as original (as it is). Nevertheless it is strictly true according to the record from which it is obtained. Now the record—the history of all these transactions is—what we hav to instruct us as to the real facts in the case. By referring to that we learn that after God had made the earth and all things upon it he held a council with somebody besides himself, and in that council he proposed that they (the firm) should go a little further and make a man and a woman, and that it could be easily done, because they would make them in their (our) own image—"let us cast them in our own mold."

And the record informs us that the job was performed, the pair were made, set up, viewed, and pronounced all right. And right then and there they were commanded to be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it.

Feeling it obligatory upon them, and fearing to disobey this command of God, they immediately sought for some place where they could set up in business, and thus make a beginning that should result in the accomplishment of the divine injunction to multiply, and replenish and subdue the earth. This was the great business before them, and there was no time to lose. They went, and they stood not upon the order of their going. They left for parts unknown.

Well, by this time God became weary from his six days' toil in creating, although it was all done by his merely speaking the word, and presto! it all appeared as if by magic. But he was tired, nevertheless, and must needs take a day of rest, which he did on the seventh day, when all creativ business was brought to a stand-still, and so remained during the seventh day.

But our friends, the man and woman, who had been created, and received the solemn command to be fruitful, multiply, and replenish, etc., found that portion of the country in which their lot had been cast was rather dry, there being nothing but herbs, as the green trees had not begun to bear fruit, nor the vegetables to ripen, and they found green herbs rather thin as a diet, so they concluded to tramp. And they tramped.

They started rather late on that memorable Saturday afternoon, and it is believed that they traveled all night that night (there was a good moonlight; as the moon had not been made long it was fresh, full, and bright), and perhaps the greater part of the next day—that first Sunday, while God was resting. Well, in course of time they arrived upon the border of a beautiful land, and the place being somewhat secluded by nature, they at once resolved to seek its sylvan shades that they might there carry out the divine decrees of multiplying and subduing, as well as the sublime fact of enjoying their honeymoon in that secure retreat away from the molestations or observation of other human intelligences should their chance to be any.

Now, the country or land to which they journeyed, and in which they pitched their tent, and wherein they dwelt, obtained its name in this wise.

Arrived upon its borders and standing upon an eminence they were enabled to take in a view of a large tract of land the exceeding beauty of which was very striking and impressiv, and it appears to hav had a very imposing effect upon the happy pair.

For while the man, in rapt contemplation of the sublime scene before them, was barely able to exclaim, as he did: "O Nancy, Nancy!* my beloved Nancy! this is heaven! Here let us dwell. What say you Nancy? Speak and tell me that I may know!" the fair Nancy's heart was too full for utterance, and weeping as she stood, she could only signify her too ready assent to the inspiring language of her noble consort by nodding her head, and this she did in so emphatic a manner that the simple though significant act so impressed her husband that he immediately and exultingly exclaimed, "This fair land shall be called the land of Nod, and henceforth and forever it shall be known by that name, by virtue of and in honor of the elegant and expressiv nod and nodding of my artless and angelic wife." And thus is was that that simple nod of her beautiful head gave the name to the land of Nod, which tradition and history hav both sacredly preserved, and handed down even to our own time.

Time rolls on and the happy pair go forth in their primeval innocence, and right royally and well do they fulfil the divine injunction to multiply, replenish, and subdue.

In the mean time God gets rested from his fatigue, and going forth on the morning of the eighth day to survey the work of his hands, he quite naturally desires to view his latest piece of workmanship, which was his man and woman. But lo, and behold! upon looking carefully around, they are nowhere to be found!

For God said, "There is not a man to be found to till the ground." In his absence they had skipped, and gone over to Nod, and probably forgetting (in the multiplicity of his works) that he had made them and left them to dry, he at once resolves to make another pair, and accordingly he proceeds to the work, and this time he tells us how he did it, to wit: He scrapes up a little dust, he wets it, and then he rolls it until it becomes a little stiff like, and not having a potters'-wheel handy upon which to turn and mold the man, he performs the little job entirely by hand, fashioning it after his own model, and in due time he brought him out a full-fledged man, all but his breathing apparatus, and that was accomplished by merely his breathing into the man his own breath, and behold the man drew his breath, and became a living soul.

Now, all that would hav been considered wonderful, to say the least, in some ages of the world, but it was nothing remarkable then. The age of miracles had not then arrived upon the earth's stage.

Well, Adam (for such was his name), was a full-fledged man right at the start. What use to make any other? The times required a perfect man in every sense of the word. He must not only be perfect in his physique, but he must be wise and perfect in knowledge and know all the idoms of the Hebrew language, the same that God used in conversing with him, because he was called upon to name the cattle, and all the beasts and fishes and fowls and the creeping things, and it must be admitted, I think, that considering his youth and the limited time he had to acquire a liberal education, since he came upon the green earth (with few exceptions), Adam did well in giving appropriate names to things.

But now God saw that his work yet required a few finishing touches to make it a little more perfect, and he resumed his labor. And now he comes as a horticulturist. He plants a garden, and trees around it and in it. And he made all things lovely and good to the sight, with fruits enough to eat, and he told his man Adam to pluck and eat of all the trees in the garden except one.

And that tree of which the man was forbidden to touch or eat the fruit thereof was called the Tree of Knowledge, and it was set exactly in the middle of the garden, in a conspicuous place, and its fruit was fair and very beautiful to look upon (it is believed that they were apples, of the variety now known as the Baldwin—a choice winter fruit), and the sight of the fruit was indeed tempting.

Time passes on, and both God and his man Adam observed that the man had no mate, while all the other animals were paired, the male with the female. And as Adam observed this fact, he spoke up rather complainingly to God in regard to it. But God was equal to the emergency, and he suggested to Adam that it was about time for him to take a nap, and suiting his acts to the occasion, he proceeds to administer upon Adam a slight but very effectiv opiate, which had the effect of bringing a deep sleep upon him. And while Adam slept and snored soundly God hurried to perform upon him a curious surgical operation. It was no less than to extract from Adam his fifth rib. And it was done with a large carving-knife, and so well and smoothly was it performed that when Adam awoke he was unaware of the wonderful operation which he had been subjected to, nor could he be persuaded to believe it till the rib was exhibited to him in the lovely form of a female.

But the tangible proof—the ocular demonstration—being presented to Adam, he succumbed, and exclaimed: "Why, this is bone of my bone! This is a part of myself, sure! And now she shall be called woman, because she was taken from man." And looking her carefully over, and contemplating her in all her aspects of youth and beauty, Adam lavished upon her the most extravagant expressions of his admiration, and right then and there he declared his love for her, and offering her his heart and hand, he proposed an engagement with her, and that together they should set up housekeeping immediately.

Adam, no doubt, perceived the policy, if not the necessity, of prompt and immediate action in securing for a bride one so beautiful and lovely, and before she had time to properly consider his offer, and whether or not by a little coquetting and procrastinating she might do better. But, like many of her fair daughters, she was easily pleased, and accepted her first offer, and the marriage ceremony (such as it was) was performed jointly by God and Adam, her husband.

The marriage accomplished, the wedding over, advice and instructions as to their future life and conduct seemed the next thing in order. And now God places them in the garden which he had planted and told them to hoe it and weed it out well and keep things in good order, and that they might eat of all the fruits in the garden except those Baldwin apples; those he reared for his own use.

Now, mind, he says, you must not eat or even touch that tree or its fruit; and if you do touch or eat of that fruit you shall die that very same day.

It must be observed that the first man and woman which God made were not placed under any restrictions whatsoever in regard to their diet, but, on the contrary, they were informed that every herb and every tree bearing fruit or seed upon the face of the earth should be meat for them. Perhaps, however, if they had not skipped as they did, and while God was resting, they, too, might hav received some further instructions and commands in regard to eating, and certain consequences which might grow out of it. But nothing of the kind was done, and they were left free both to roam and to eat. And when we contemplate the lives of those two men and their wives, together with the results that followed, the one being left free to do as he pleased and go where he liked, with no threatening commands hanging over him, as that he should die if he did thus and so, or else that he must toil and sweat for a living all his days, and that his posterity after him should do the same, as the second pair were informed that they must, we are led to envy the first pair and to congratulate them upon their more favorable condition, resulting perhaps, from their energy and foresight in thus starting on their travels on their own account and without waiting for further instructions.

They thus escaped what might hav been to them and their posterity a fearful doom had they tarried over the Sabbath. But they left, taking with them only the divine command to be fruitful, multiply, replenish, and subdue. They soon discovered that delightful country which they called the land of Nod. There they tarried, and there they multiplied.

THE POLITICAL ASPECT.

MAZOMANIE, WIS., Aug. 1, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I noticed not long since an article in your paper with the above caption, purporting to hav been written by a Mr. R. H. Lamb, and more recently a very good criticism of it by Moses Hull, Esq. But there was one very important question in connection with this subject that Mr. Hull neglected to mention which I, with your consent, propose to consider. In the first place, I would say in relation to Mr. Lamb Mr. Hull very properly said that although Mr. Lamb might be well posted in relation to Liberalism, yet he betrayed great ignorance in relation to the Greenback cause. There are three horns to Mr. Lamb's dilemma, and he can hang himself upon either one that fits him best. First, the quantity and quality of his brains may be a good excuse for him, or he may be a capitalist with bonds and mortgages, etc. If so, he would be entitled to the same excuse that all Shylocks are, that is, self-interest; or he may be a natural-born tyrant, who thinks that all poor, laboring men and women hav no rights that he is bound to respect.

But I commenced writing this article with the idea of supplying what I considered a very important omission in Mr. Hull's criticism, that is, the subject of taxation. Now, I suppose that every person that knows anything about the doctrins of the Greenback party knows that one very important principle with them—nay, I consider it the most important—is the doctrin of a graduated income tax to support the government, the only righteous system of taxation that has ever been suggested. I say it is the best because it would compel the wealth instead of the poverty of the country to support the government.

Now, in order that I may not be misunderstood, I will state a few facts, namely: To support the general government and to furnish money for all the official thieves we hav to raise about $300,000,000 annually, and three-fourths of this enormous amount is wrung out of the mouths and off of the backs of the poor laboring classes that ought not to be taxed at all, while the other fourth is paid by the capitalists who own three-fourths of all the wealth of the country. Now, it does seem to me as the injustice and robbery is so manifest that all the laboring men would rise in their might with their ballots and put both the Republican and Democratic parties beyond the reach of a political resurrection

Another important doctrin of the Greenback party is the land reform. What I understand the party to mean by land reform is that every person of proper age shall hav as much land as they can occupy, and that there shall be a limitation to the amount that any one person shall hold, or, in other words, that there shall be no such thing as land monopoly. My space will not permit me to speak of a dozen other important measures of the Greenback party. Now, in conclusion, I will say that I don't believe there is any right-minded man or woman who has any feeling in common with the lower strata of humanity that will not indorse the above sentiments, Mr. Lamb to the contrary notwithstanding. O. THOMAS.

ORGANIZE! ORGANIZE!

CINCINNATI, O., Aug. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: There is nothing that would so build up the great and true principles of Freethought as for every Freethinker to unite and co-operate with all the other Freethinkers in any and every part of the world. Let the whole body, which are millions in number, become as one man, full of zeal, and truly resolved to push the honest truth as found in science and nature's grand store, and rest not until every city, town, and village hath an organized Freethought club, where both sexes can hold most pleasant meetings, embracing lectures, music, and occasionally a dance. It should be a place of good cheer and jolly times, full of vigor and free from every vulgarism. Every woman can be a lady, and every man can be a gentleman, and each one can spare a trifle to sustain an organization which hath for its objects the sole enlightenment of the mind and the best methods of promoting human happiness and domestic prosperity.

The writer of this article dwells in a city of 250,000 inhabitants, with thousands of Freethinkers therein, and yet there is no society or club formed in the city. This is a sad neglect, and arises from the coldness and indifference of Freethinkers toward each other, instead of a warm recognition of each other, and a fraternal feeling of each others' joys and sorrows, and building up of each others' principles, and showing to the wide world how our organizations are the true and solid arguments in favor of a bright and intelligent life on this globe, instead of a visonary spook life, utterly unknowable and unthinkable.

Once more, let all Freethinkers unite and cripple the powers of supernatural darkness, and show to the world the slavish and debasing influence of superstition; and instead of having untaxed gospel shops and joss houses, let us hav secular schools, libraries, and temples of scientific learning, where light and understanding reign supreme, and ignorance never comes—except to receive instruction.

Brother Freethinkers, life is short, and is the only opportunity we hav to improve the world in which we exist. I, therefore, appeal to your manhood, and invite you to co-operate with the writer of this article that wisdom and truth may be put upon its passage to a successful issue. Yours in hope, T. WINTER.

SPIRITUALISM AND LIBERALISM.

ADRIAN, MICH., Aug. 24, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: As I hav just returned from the attendance of the second annual meeting of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists at Battle Creek, I thought I would giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in other parts of our broad country a little inkling of how the cause is prospering with us here in the Wolverine state. It has been my privilege to attend all our annual and semi-annual meetings, but this last one in my humble opinion was the most telling one for the truth and the right that we hav ever held, though some with less liberal ideas made an effort to narrow down the platform to their own contracted views. And even our book-agent, Mr. Day, of Detroit, was among this number, and in publicly announcing our newspapers he omitted the Boston Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER, two of the most independent and outspoken papers in our land, and which hav now done, and are now doing, more to break the bonds of an ignorant and superstitious religious faith than any other two papers in the world. But he upheld, as worthy the patronage of the people, the Religio-Philosophical Journal—a sheet that has besmeared itself all over, time and again, with filthy obscenity, lies, and slander of the dirtiest, meanest, and most contemptible kind. For proof I need only refer the reader to its pages for October, 1879, in the case of D. M. Bennett, who for his manly and independent course in the defense of our American liberties was now a victim of the spleen of the minions of the Christian church, and was serving out a year at hard labor in one of the most cruel penitentiaries in this country, and of course was unable to defend himself, and while thus incarcerated the Religio man, finding that the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER was increasing instead of diminishing, went hunting to see what he could find against the latter paper and its editor, and finally he finds this old foolish, private letter, and buys it up and givs it a place in his paper, prefaced with some square and flat lies. And this is the literature that Mr. Day, one of our members, a Spiritualist, can hold up to the association and those who attend our conventions as worthy of patronage. But THE TRUTH SEEKER he omits to say a word about, but luckily there were those there who could rise and show copies of the paper and ask for names to its list, and I am glad to say that it got its full share of patronage.

I might say more about the Spiritual side of the convention, such as spirits coming and taking possession of their mediums while others were speaking; of their getting up two at a time, in conference meeting; of one commencing to play on the organ in order to stop the speaker, who was Mr. Rowell, a Liberal, and an agent for your paper. He had not spoken over ten minutes, and had said nothing disrespectful of any one, but was talking good common sense, from his own mental standpoint, and actuated by a sense of duty, and moved by the prompting of his own spirit. But this disorderly conduct of the spirits through their mediums in thus taking possession of their weak brains while another had the floor was sharply criticised the next day by a member, after which the worthy chairman indorsed the criticism by observing that he hoped it might be of use, and I am sure that I can say the same.

Following this we had some music, and then Mr. McCracken, of Detroit, took the floor and made some very good remarks on Liberalism of the Liberal League stamp. In closing he recommended the people to organize Spiritual and Liberal associations in their several neighborhoods that should be auxiliary to this association. Five persons can form an organized body and will hav the right to send one delegate to this association, who will hav the right to vote in all of our business meetings. Here in this arrangement we can see shadowed forth one object that the contrivers of this movement had in hitching on Liberalism to their own Spiritual rites. Mr. McCracken is one of the leading Spiritualists.

But enough on the Spiritual side. I must now add a little on the Liberal side of the Convention, for that is where its grandeur comes in.

One of the most able and intelligent speakers on that side was W. F. Jamieson. He is not a formal member of the association, but the Liberal element was strong enough to demand that he be heard in spite of that, and even if he had outgrown the notion that people lived on after their bodies were dead and buried. So on Saturday evening the chairman gave out the notice from the rostrum that on the following morning at eleven o'clock Mr. Jamieson would occupy the platform one hour. When that hour arrived there was a large crowd of listeners eagerly awaiting him. He in his speech defended himself in a kind and charitable spirit against the attacks that had been made upon him by a narrow-minded Spiritualists, who were inclined to call him a backslider into cold Materialism, the same as church bigots heap such names on those who mentally outgrow sectarian prejudices. He gave us a little sketch of his religious life, first in the church, then in the Spiritualist ranks as a defender of that faith, until his mental powers had unfolded to that extent that he could honestly defend it no longer, and then he claimed the same right to step out of that on to what seemed to him to be a higher plane of thought that he had to step out of the church into Spiritualism. He observed, near the close, that this would not be the platform to hold a discussion on, but if there were any of the public speakers who would be willing to publicly discuss this question with him he would willingly meet them in debate on a free platform, he taking the Materialistic side and they the Spiritualistic.

Then we had Mr. Babcock, of St. Johns, with us. He is always spicy and full of wit and common sense. His labors with the Christians of St. Johns in reference to their superstitious course in persisting in reading the Bible in their public schools is well known to all who hav read his book entitled, "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" After he had spoken for one hour, criticising the Christian Bible, one would hav thought that it was truly a remarkable book.

The closing speech on Sunday evening was given by Mr. Burnham, of East Saginaw. As he had been an ordained minister in the Christian church, he was abundantly able to unravel some of its mysteries to us from a Liberal and intelligent standpoint. He showed most conclusivly that the whole plan or scheme of Christian salvation held up to the people for their acceptance is based on selfishness, and as the religious sentiment is the strongest characteristic in the human race, this superstition becomes a feeder of his most selfish faculties, and thus is the breeder of most of our troubles in social life as well as political. I think that every free and intelligent person who listened to Mr. Burnham for that hour while he unraveled the mysteries of the Christian church must hav come away convinced that it was not the best kind of religion for the people to invest in. S. D. MOORE.

LESLIE, MICH., Aug. 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am in hopes of getting an unbiased account of the old country by way of Mr. Bennett's letters. I liv in a town of twelve hundred inhabitants and five churches, so you can see it is quite orthodox. Hoping that Mr. Bennett may hav both good health and good luck on his journey around this planet, I remain

Yours truly, H. HAYNES.

LEADVILLE, COL., Aug. 19, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I hasten to send you $8—$5 for that long trip, and $3 for subscription to my latest acquaintance—THE TRUTH SEEKER. Shall be very glad to hav you come up here on your way home. Hoping you will hav the pleasantest journey possible, I remain, Yours, JAMES C. GRIFFITHS.

ASHLAND, OR., Aug. 16, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Inclosed is one dollar, for which please send me two lithograph pictures of friend Bennett. I want to look at him while he is so far away. His picture will be worth more to me than a dozen crucified saviors and dying gods.

Ever yours for the cause of right,

O. COOLEDGE.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Aug. 25, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I hav had the pleasure of the second reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and like it very much. I feel that I cannot do without it as long as circumstances permit, therefore find inclosed one dollar, and when this expires I will endeavor to renew. From a friend of truth,

CHAS. E. TRASK.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, Aug. 25, 1881.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Will you please send me about half a dozen of those posters? I wish to see if, by decorating our town with them, I can increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I presume you are getting along smoothly with your office work in spite of Mr. Bennett's departure, and only hope that you and Mr. Macdonald will not be obliged to remind too many of your subscribers that they are behindhand with their dues.

It has been a very hot summer in these parts—hot enough even for Christians, and in New York city it must hav been frightful. Large cities hav the advantage of being run by bigger rascals than smaller places, and so in addition to the great heat, which cannot be helped, they enjoy various odors which might be helped. My garden has suffered considerably from the great heat; but, thanks to the short-sighted stupidity and cupidity of our city fathers, the depredations of roaming cattle and geese are a more exasperating evil than the blighting effects of heat.

It is wonderful to me how people can cling so tenaciously to customs, habits, and religions just because they are old. Might as well worship Gog and Magog and dress in sheep-skins, which are fashions still older.

We spend millions of dollars in this country for fences, and just now Iowa farmers are spending thousands fighting the barbed-wire fence monopoly, and all for what? Not for improving or even beautifying the country, but to keep out other people's cattle. The simple device of saving decent people's money by compelling the mean and selfish ones to take care of their own cattle, keeping it off other people's property at their own expense, appears to be too complicated for the intellect of the average citizen, especially of the Dutch, Irish, or Swede p er suasion. If all the money—not to speak of the valuable time—thrown away on fences and lawyers had been expended in planting trees where needed, cultivating flower gardens, and beautifying homes (all of which is almost an impossibility in Burlington under the present cattle regime), if we scattered more TRUTH SEEKERS, Physiologists, and other practical and truthful literature, then we might hav something to show for our money, life would be brighter, and all those Christians who feed their cattle on other people's property would hav to play second fiddle.

This cattle question is as demoralizing to petty legislatures and boards of aldermen as the slavery question was in Congress. It is a monstrous injustice done toward farmers and citizens to oblige them to fence cattle out instead of simply having the owners of cattle fence them in or herd them or stable them. This town, for instance, might be a beautiful place, with its numerous natural advantages; but no owner of a garden, a shrub, a flower bed, or a shade-tree has any rights which the owner of a cow or a goose or an old horse or a gamboling heifer is bound to respect.

An experience of fifteen years authorizes me to advise all lovers in the shape of anything horticultural who may be ambitious to come out West, not to pitch their tent in any place like Burlington, Iowa.

When Mr. Bennett returns from his trip round the world it will be time for you to take a trip around, at least part of it, and then I hope to meet you at my home in Burlington; but I shall hav no fine avenues of trees to show you, no public parks, no fountains, no signs of modern civilization, except a number of individual efforts under adversity; but I can show you them cows, the special pets of our city council. Please remember me to Mr. Macdonald.

Wishing you continued good health, I remain

Your friend, CORNELIA BOECKLIN.

LITCHFIELD, ILL., Aug. 20, 1881.

DEAR EDITOR: The Bible oath and civil affirmation regarding Bradlaugh's position needs, for clear understanding and purport by the masses, in spite of education, a correcting explanation. The church oath is opposit unblindfolded common sense, truth, and healthy reasoning, the fundamental proof of real criminal mental slavery by falsehood and deception, and is treated justly by many as a farce. It shall thereby be expressed a guaranty of truthful assertions or statements by giving as pledge a promised out and supernatural heritage of possessions whereof no creature has an idea, much less a proof, to tender. Bradlaugh's matured, healthy mind places him before us as mental sovereign, and it can honestly, therefore, not stoop to traditional deception.

HOMO SANUR.

MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER, Dear Madam: Our old friend, James Price, died at 12 o'clock to-day. His mind became weak about a month ago, and last Sunday he sent for a Methodist minister and told him that he wished to be buried by the church. The ministers hav attended to him ever since and administered the communion. He will be buried to-morrow afternoon from the church.

All this will appear strange at first to you, no doubt; but now let me make a statement of facts as they occurred:

About two months ago I told him that his time was getting very short here below, and asked him if he was yet of the same belief He told me he was, that he could see no reason for him to change; but he was afraid if he lived much longer that his mind would become weak and that he might act and say things that he would be ashamed of were he in his right mind. Furthermore, he requested me not to hav his remains taken to any church to be mumbled over by the parsons.

The church claims a great victory over Freethought; but to my mind it is no victory at all. Yours truly, G.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Thus reads a letter from a friend at Key West, Florida, and I giv it to you as a specimen of the death-bed conversions that the church has so often crowed over and held up to sensible Liberals as proof that death always tests the sincerity of one's faith. I've had innumerable letters from Mr. Price for years and years, and knew him to hav had no more belief in gods, ghosts, and bibles than I hav myself; but he has been dying for several years, and for months been failing in his mind, so that his letters became childish and worthless, and I merely wrote replies because it cheered his sick room, and I could furnish him a few little trifles that he could eat, for he was a town pauper—cheated out of hundreds of dollars by the very Christians who now rejoice over their pitiful victory in winning for the church one whose mind was a total wreck, and whose claim to humanity was only this—that he still bore the form of man and breathed the vital air.

While we deplore the fact that even this little concession has been made to the claims of a horrid superstition, thus encouraging it to go on building more bulwarks against the spread of real truth and real knowledge, we will only let it be as one more incentiv for us all to work harder and do better service in the ranks of freedom, lest when we die we too may be held up in mockery of all our present wishes and hopes, and our last strong vital will be supplanted by one made when we were only a living corpse and babbling of the childish tales of our nursery.

Work while it is day, my friends, if you would escape the doom of this helpless old man, whose one Liberal brother could do nothing against the crowding hordes of the priestly crew who, ghoul-like, seized the body before the breath had made it clay.

Oh, is it not time these heaped-up iniquities of the church were denounced in tones that would reach to the uttermosts? Take hold, brothers and sisters, and begin to do something now. Begin to-day in dead earnest. Study, read, think, argue, and, above all, liv your faith in works, and see how quickly we can kill off and utterly extirpate the last vestige of this superstition from our bright and beautiful earth and make it the home of joy, happiness, and hope. Let us sweep away, one by one, the poison clouds of priestly teachings and sow the fair seeds of happy sunshine, of jubilant cheerfulness, and merry contentedness where now reigns self-abasement, dreary ascetism, and the universal gloom of a deceptiv, false, and wicked theology.

We must—we must utterly destroy the vile beast, and then its pestiferous progeny will no longer rob one of earth's hapless children of its birthright to the bounteous blessings of nature's far-reaching and ever magnificent benevolence. Let us work for this glad day; work in hope, work in faith, and work in the sure knowledge that it will come, because every step we take brings with it a ray of the coming sunshine and a peal of its joy-bells.

The end is not far. See! Victory is perched on our banner? Can we falter? Get up Leagues, add to your Liberal libraries, support our papers, and sow seed in all ways. Be enthused by this great labor of love, than which the world has never known a greater.

"In all thy ways hast thou e'er done
The best thy hand could do?
If so, be sure the crown is worn,
Fadeless, pure, and true."

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 29, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I send you the copy of an extract taken from a lecture of M. L. Hamilton, delivered at a meeting of the Freethinkers' League, on "The Failure of Materialism to Solve the Question of a Hereafter." He said, in refering to an admission of Du Bois Raymond, the eminent German scientist, of the failure of his philosophy in conceiving matter to be otherwise than indifferent to its position and motion: "If inert matter is indifferent to its past, present, or future, how can it possess consciousness or intelligence? How can any combination of atoms that are utterly indifferent to their position and motion move themselvs? Why should they consciously move about and perform an act in harmony with their wish or desire? How can they hav any motiv or a desire to move at all? How can they combine without an object? How can an atom know it exists? How can they produce their own consciousness? We are not only machines, but conscious and thinking beings." It will please me, and perhaps many more of your readers, if you will giv the above extract a place in your paper, together with your views of the questions it contains. I am a seeker after truth, and think it a good way to obtain it by asking questions of those who hav thought deeply on the subj ct.

Yours truly, E. F. BLAISDELL.

SUPERIOR, NEB., Aug. 31, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav read in your last issue the communication of Mr. B. F. Butt, on "Charitable Institutions." The idea is a very good one, and I cordially participate in it. I think if the Liberals would nominate a committee to raise funds for that purpose, and agitated this matter it would be a succe ss.

I hav a farm of 320 acres of good land, 87 acres of it under cultivation, with two houses on it, one small and one large house with seven fine rooms and good cellar. The house is well constructed, with a fine view and a very healthy climate. I would donate it to the Liberal orphan asylum, with a few conditions, if the committee would find it the proper place. Let the ball roll. I hope the Liberals of the United States will think about this and do something at once.

Yours for Liberal charity, A. MINSKI.

NORVELL, MICH., Aug. 28, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Learning that you hav already undertaken the arduous task of making a tour of observation around the world, and having long felt desirous of obtaining the books promised to such as sent in $5.00 to assist you on your journey, I inclose that amount, which please accept, together with my best wishes for your safe and prosperous return to the lonely wife, and the many friends who are so solicitous for your welfare.

Yours, with esteem, MRS. R. S. LUCE.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 23, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I would like to tell your readers something about the Rev. R. D. Herbert, who was buried here last Sunday, Aug. 21st, but I do not feel equal to the task. He was of such sterling worth, of such a kindly and manly disposition, that to do him justice one would need a pen as prolific as Mr. Bennett's, and a soul as eloquent as Ingersoll's. There was no reform calculated to benefit mankind at large that would not find a friend in Mr. Herbert. He seemed to penetrate farther into unwritten gospel than any other man with whom I am familiar. There was a passionate appeal to reason in all his sermons which seemed to sink deep into the consciences of those who sat under the charm of his peculiar natural eloquence.

I say natural eloquence because it seems to come direct from the soul, without any studied effort. How often I hav found myself carried away by his magic power, carried off to the "shoreless vast," to a momentary view of unbounded worlds; such was the power of his eloquence.

Ingersoll wrote Mr. Chainey, that his (Mr. Chainey's) "sermon on 'Iconoclasm' was the bravest one ever preached in an American pulpit." With all due respect to Mr. Chainey, whom I greatly admire, I think I hav heard some equally as brave from the brave, proud, manly Mr. Herbert. To him every good thought was a prayer, and every good deed was a sermon. You to whom, perhaps until now, his name has been a stranger, you can form no conception of the feeling that existed between Mr. Herbert and his "good friends," as he was wont to call us; but to us who knew him personally, who knew him as a friend and fellow-member, the case is different. You may form a sympathetic feeling for him; you may admire the character of the man I am telling you about. But we who are fortunate enough to know him, we love him. We remember his pleasantries in the pulpit, his reverend, profound disposition in the parlor, and we love him. We remember that he wanted to make Sunday a day for social pleasures in which the children of the rich and poor alike could enjoy life among the flowers and green trees. And we love him for that. And we love him because he was a man.

There were strong men wept freely in the church that day who are not apt to weep at trifles. We who knew him as a brother, a fellow-member of "Friends in Council," wept like children.

He could not remain in the Methodist Episcopal Church, with its soulless dogmas, and preach its senseless creed to a multitude of thoughtless beings. He was too honest to do that, and so he came out under the more Liberal and brighter banner of Unitarianism. If he had sought for the applause of the world; if he had desired great notoriety as a philosopher; if his ambition had pointed him to the author's chairs, they were at his call. He was no "blind leader of the blind," but a great brain leading other brains. His funeral sermon was preached by a bro her Unitarian who had climbed the Methodist ladder, and is, as Mr. Herbert was, a Liberal, thoughtful man.

The world is better for his having lived. May nature's choicest blessings rest upon those he left. He is where those people go who hav done their duty.

Respectfully, O. G. P.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., Sept. 3, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I must thank Mr. T. Winter for his remarks on Spiritualism in your issue of Aug. 27th. It shows how easily I was deceived at Cassadaga Spiritual camp-meeting. I saw a medium, but do not remember his name. I wrote three questions on three pieces of paper—two to my wife, who died July 2, 1881, and one question to my daughter, who died twenty-one years ago. The papers with the questions were rolled up in balls with five others. My three questions were picked out, given to me, and the initials given at once. The medium then bit off a small bit of slate pencil and laid it on a slate. He then laid another slate on the first slate, which inclosed the scrap of pencil perhaps the size of a wheat kernel. I took hold of one side of the slate, and the medium the other, in broad daylight, on top of the table, and in a moment we heard the pencil writing, and in a minute or two the signal was given by raps that they were through. We took the slates apart, and found the answer given correct and written on the upper side of the lower slate. The writing included nineteen lines, and purported to be from my wife.

I think half your readers are Spiritualists, and I think every one would hav believed as I did if they had seen it.

Inclosed find $6—$5 for the books of travel, and $1 for the plates. I think it will take another dollar from each. Fraternally yours, C. H. LATHAM.

BLOOMFIELD, MO., Aug. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Now that our great head is on his tour around the world, I feel a little more anxious that the paper should liv and flourish than I ever felt before, although a patron of it from the first to the last number. I was not one who favored his trip around the world, thinking that if we could dispel the errors of our own land other lands might take care of themselvs.

Inclosed find $5.50—$3 for the renewal of my subscription, and $1.50 for "Superstition in All Ages," and $1 for the "Infidel Pulpit," by George Chainey, Vol. I. Accept the best wishes of a true Liberal.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed I send my check for one share in the round-the-world fund. I would that I could take more shares, but cannot see my way clear to do so at present.

With kind regards to all, I am as ever most devotedly, Your friend, FRANK RIVERS.

WE hav yet a good many posters on hand which it will be well for the friends to hav to aid them in obtaining new subscribers to the paper. They will be cheerfully mailed at the request of friends.

Life.

Some people think this scene of life
A frightful gladiatorial strife,
A struggle for existence,
Where class contends with class, and each
Must plunder all within his reach
To earn his own subsistence.

Shocked at the internecine air
Of this arena, they forswear
Its passions and its quarrels;
They will not sacrifice, to liv,
All that to life its charms can giv,
Nor sell for bread their morals.

Enthusiasts! check your reveries,
Ye cannot always pluck at ease
From pleasure's cornucopia;
Ye cannot alter nature's plan,
Change to a perfect being man,
Nor England to Utopia.

Plunge in the busy current, stem
The tide of errors ye condemn,
And fill life's activ uses;
Begin, reform yourselvs, and liv
To prove that honesty may thrive
Unaided by abuses.

Moral Cosmetics.

Ye who could save your features florid,
Lithe limbs, bright eyes, unwrinkled forehead,
From age's devastation horrid,
Adopt this plan;
'Twill make, in climates cold or torrid,
A hale old man:

Avoid in youth luxurious diet,
Restrain the passion's lawless riot;
Devoted to domestic quiet,
Be wisely gay;
So shall ye, spite of age's fiat,
Resist decay.

Seek not in Mammon-worship pleasure,
But find your richest, dearest treasure
In books, friends, music, polished leisure;
The mind, not sense,
Made the sole scale by which ye measure
Your opulence.

This is the solace, this the science,
Life's purest, sweetest, best appliance
That disappoints not man's reliance,
Whate'er his state;
But challenges, with calm defiance,
Time, fortune, fate.

Giving and Living.

Forever the sun is pouring its gold
On a hundred worlds that beg and borrow;
His warmth he squanders on summits cold,
His wealth on the homes of want and sorrow.
To withhold his largess of precious light
Is to bury himself in eternal night.
To giv
Is to liv.

The flower shines not for itself at all,
Its joy is the joy it freely diffuses;
Of beauty and balm it is prodigal,
And it livs in the light it freely loses.
No choice for the rose but glory or doom,
To exhale or smother, to wither or bloom.
To deny
Is to die.

The seas lend silvery rays to the land,
The land its sapphire streams to the ocean,
The heart sends blood to the brain of command,
The brain to the heart its lightning motion;
And over and over we yield our breath,
Till the mirror is dry and images death.
To liv
Is to giv.

He is dead whose hand is not open wide
To help the need of a human brother;
He doubles the length of his life-long ride
Who givs his fortunate place to another;
And a thousand milllons lives are his
Who carries the world in his sympathies.
To deny
Is to die.

Sectarian's Way to Heaven.

I write of the road to bliss above,
The different ways in which we move
To gain that heavenly seat;
Each studied sect, in error bound,
Think they the only road hav found
To paradise complete.

The Catholic, absolved by pope,
Thinks heretics deserve a rope,
Or else a burning flame;
Does penance at the Virgin's shrine,
Feels purified from every crime,
And claims a saintly name.

The church of England pay their tithes,
Read their long prayer with half-closed eyes,
And bless their king and queen;
They will be nobility in bliss,
And look on that sect and on this
As vulgar, low, and mean.

The Presbyterian sourly scowls,
Denouncing all as guilty souls
Who are not saved by fates;
We're the elect and you are damned,
Hell like a wallet will be crammed
With God's own reprobates.

The Baptists, washed in puddles clean,
Join Presbyterians in their scheme
Against the non-elect;
Repent and be baptized by time,
Nor sprinkle babies black with crime
Of Adam and his mate.

The Methodist, by madness drove,
Howls dreadfully on his road above,
Denouncing heavenly ire;
Repent, or God will in a trice,
Shake you o'er hell like squeaking mice
Suspended o'er the fire.

The Shaker dancing to the gate
Of bells, calls mother Ann to wait,
And hear his heavenly love;
I hav left sin and flesh below,
The devil and his works, you know,
To dance with you above.

The Quaker smoothly travels on,
Thinks cash in trade is fairly won,
And all the world are knaves;
Yet he is honest all his life.
No money gets by war or strife,
And by the spirit prays.

The Universalist will glide
To heaven as smooth as school-boys ride
Down hill on ice or snow:
Hurrah, my boys; we'll all be saved,
For hell is nothing but the grave,
And there's no future woe!

Amid such clamor, who can tell
Which is the way to heaven or hell,
Or how we must be saved?
Whether by faith, or work, or prayers,
Grace or penance, days or years,
Or cash in plenty paid?

My counsel is to walk alone,
Keep clear of troubles not your own,
And all religious strife;
Let madmen at each other roar,
Do good to all, both rich and poor,
And lead a blameless life.

PLAGIARISM

Now ready. A tract of sixteen pages, containing three articles yclept sermons, entitled,

1. Shame! Sham! Pshaw!
2. Dogs!
3. Cock-a-doodle-doo!

The first two of these appeared in the Seymour Times in reply to aspersions by William Emmette Coleman, and although he had been allowed four times the space I occupied, and a further reply was absolutely necessar yon my part, yet was I refused a further hearing. In the last article or sermon, rejected by the Seymour Times, I prove beyond all doubt that W. E. Coleman plagiarized from my pamphlet "Sunday not the Sabbath" (43 pages, 1872), all that he quoted or summarized in his tract entitled "Sabbath Observance" (18 pages. 1879), from Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Victorinus Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Luther Melancthon, Heylin, Milton, Baxter, Paley and Neander; and that every reference made to the above authors, and every statement taken the refrom, was borrowed from my work. Other indubitable proofs of plagiarism will be given.

This tract will be sent gratis to every applicant by card or letter.

CHRISTIANITY
FROM A
Scientific and Historical Standpoint.
BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusively that the system of religion which has been lit upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

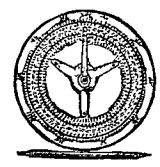
LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Partou many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.



Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS are the marvel of the world.
They are dumbfounding the scientists and physicians, and making glad the hearts of the people.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE PHYSICIANS, CHEMISTS, AND ELECTRICIANS OF BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK

GENTLEMEN: A little over a year ago I arrived in the city of Brooklyn from Europe, and at 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, commenced the sale of my patented Magnetic clothing, advertised and known as the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I addressed a circular letter to a large number of medical men in Brooklyn, in which I fully described the nature of my invention, at the same time pointing out to them the rationale of my method of cure. A few members of the profession accepted my offer, and visited me for the purpose of having my invention fully explained to them. Of those who came there was not one but readily accepted my theory of disease, and recognized the possibilities of cure by my method, but a number of those written to so forgot themselves and their character of gentlemen as to openly insult me by the return of my letters and in other ways openly expressed their bitterness of thought by designating me a CHARLATAN and a fraud. This line of conduct impelled me to open warfare against the now universal system of DRUG TREATMENT; but knowing as I do that there are many noble men in the profession who are ever ready to examin and accept that which is really beneficial and efficacious, no matter from what source it may come. With this fact before me, I am constrained to call upon the faculty of Brooklyn and New York, and respectfully invite them to visit my Manufactory and Consulting Rooms, when I will explain fully everything connected with my method of treatment. I will giv them the names and addresses in Brooklyn and New York of hundreds of its best citizens, who hav under my system recovered from every form of malady known to Nosologists, and this without a single dose of medicin. I am, moreover, prepared to take a patient from every physician in Brooklyn that he has given over as an incurable case, and place upon such patients to the number of FIVE HUNDRED, a suit of my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, free of charge, and will undertake to cure ninety per cent of all those handed over to me, within twelve months from the time of putting on my GARMENTS, my only condition being that PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT bind themselvs not to giv or use medicin of any kind. I will sign bonds for five thousand dollars, to be given to any institution named, should I in the twelve months fail to cure ninety per cent of all heir incurables under their several systems. I will also at once hand over $5,000 worth of my appliances to any hospital, free of charge, to be placed upon the sick poor in such institution, bonds to be given in this case also, that medicin will not be given in any way
This is a standing offer for twelve months from date.
The following physicians may be referred to as having witnessed the effects of my GARMENTS:

Prof. CARMICHAEL,	Dr. ELTINGE,
FORBES PARKER,	Dr. THAYER,
Dr. DEMEREST,	Dr. TINKER,
Dr. CLARK,	Dr. TRUE.

The following gentlemen can also be referred to: Commissioner Garrison, J. B. Hoyt, Spruce street; Col. Bayard Clark, Judge Levi Parsons, E. Sinclair Clark, Lafayette avenue; J. W. Littlefield, artist; Mr. Frazer, corner of Reid avenue and Broadway. These, with thousands of others, hav worn my garments. Therefore, gentlemen, in conclusion I most respectfully submit that you owe a duty to yourselvs and the public to inquire into the nature of the invention thus presented to you. But knowing, as I do, that all new remedies for the cure of disease should be well attested scientifically by practicing physicians before being generally prescribed, I herewith offer you every facility for testing the same, and would respectfully call your attention to a portion of Professor Parson's lecture, published in Baltimore this week. You will therein see the necessity for your inquiry as to the position that magnetism is destined to take among the REMEDIAL AGENCIES now prescribed through your colleges. Hoping that you will seriously and in a fair spirit inquire into the nature of my invention, I remain,
Very respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

READ THE FOLLOWING PORTION OF A LECTURE, BY PROFESSOR PARSONS, AND SAY HOW MUCH LONGER CAN THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN RESIST THE INQUIRY WHICH THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM DEMANDS.

MORE LIGHT.

THE HARMONY OF THE SPHERES.

DISCOVERY OF THE UNIVERSAL PREVALENCE

OF A PRINCIPLE THAT GRANDLY MANIFESTS THE WISDOM AND GOODNESS

OF ALMIGHTY GOD.

Professor W. H. Parsons, a talented and modest gentleman, who is now a resident of our city, has made a discovery that is likely to be regarded with the deepest interest by men of science everywhere, since it not only explains much heretofore mysterious in astronomical science, but is calculated to impress all minds with more profound admiration for the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God.

This discovery is that the sublime principle of MAGNETIC REPULSION is coextensiv with MAGNETIC ATTRACTION throughout our universe. This magnetic repulsion has equal potency with Newton's law of the ATTRACTION OF GRAVITATION in regulating the movements of all celestial bodies and maintaining harmony among them all. This principle was first developed in the course of manifestations and experiments of Professor Parsons, who is an electro-therapeutist, or medical electrician, while making researches into the relations of electro-magnetism to animal life, disease, and death.

Without attempting to trace how far previous advances of science had prepared the way for the grand discovery by Professor Parsons to which we desire to call attention, we may interest our readers by glancing at the great facts in magnetic philosophy.

Magnetism and electricity—the one the manifestation of the other, with different forms of motion; the one vibratory, as light and heat; the other spiral, as demonstrated by the induction balance, each convolution possessed with magnetic poles—are neither imponderable fluids nor atomic streams, but forces known only from results, the direction of the individual force in each molecule of all magnets, whether in the blood or the heavens, being the opposit of the force in its vicinity, giving rise to a magnetic force, says Maxwell, of extreme complexity, but which, by its repellant as well as its attractiv power, works order out of apparent and really original chaos, and under law established at creation's dawn is the principle of all motion and all life in every kingdom of nature, either in the heavens above or the earth beneath.

Perfect polarization, whereby like poles repel and unlike attract and neutralize each other, whether in the celestial system, including our own planet, or the circulatory system of the blood and nerves, of what is as fearfully, wonderfully, and as curiously made—the divine organism of man—is the source and law [it is not attraction of gravitation, affirmed by Newton, or the undefined centripetal and centrifugal forces of scientists], but the omnipotent and omnipresent governing force which maintains all motion, all life, all health, and all harmony in the cosmogony of the universe.

The law (attraction and repulsion) in each molecular current, or rings of electricity, in either the circular corpuscles which float in arterial or venous blood, or the circular orbs which float in the firmament of the heavens, is the now manifest and realized omnipresent and omnipotent attribute of nature and nature's god by which worlds and all celestial bodies, including comets, are sustained in space without possibility of collision, and all motion, whether orbital or axital, has become the harmony of the spheres.

Its disturbance in the one is the source of all commotion, celestial (as solar magnetic storms) or terrestrial, inward, as in the magnetic shocks of the earthquake, or outward, in electric storms by land or sea. Its interruption in the animal organism whereby the ultimate electric molecules of the blood, tissues, nerves, and muscles, each with a positiv and negativ pole (recently discovered and announced to exist by Snettle Scoutellon, of Paris, and Dubois Reymond), become non-electric or demagnetized, in which non-electric state, says Reymond, these molecules are turned toward each other with like poles so that two become one, possessed of one positive zone and two negativ poles, and when in the electrotonic state unequal or unlike poles are turned toward each other. This non-electric or demagnetized state of the iron molecules of the blood, or the electric molecules of the nerves and muscles is, therefore, the source of all disorder and all diseases in the human cosmos.

I may be, and we believe it is, the law that the celestial strangers known as comets are magnetic regulators designed to resupply the wasted magnetic forces of the spheres they traverse in space, creating apparent temporary disturbance and increased activity in the magnetic forces of the sun, plainly visible in the solar spectrum, and due, says Lockyear, in a recent lecture before the Royal Astronomical Society, to the ejection of heated matter in the interior of the sun, the result of increased temperature and consequent breaking up of magnetic iron in the sun into simpler constituents.

Whatever weight is due to this theory of magnetic restoration of exhausted planets—illustrated in the increased temperature of the sun thus excited by the positiv forces of its late and still freshly announced celestial visitors—it has been demonstrated that the electro magnetic or nervo electric vital forces of the human organism can be uniformly replenished and resupplied and reinvigorated and revitalized from the very verge of dissolution and partial demagnetization of the ultimate electric molecules of blood and nerve by the truthful application of the maxim of the great German Esculapius, that like cures like, with the universal law of proper polarization, celestial and terrestrial, revealed and understood, man may and will control its forces; unlock the arcana of nature in all her kingdoms; stand within the veil face to face with the magnetic source of universal life and motion; and the preventiv of decay and premature death approach to comprehend with a spirit of exultation and awe the now revealed, yet still invisible, power, which, when darkness was upon the face of the deep and chaos reigned, moved upon the face of the waters, uttered the supreme fiat, and solar magnetism burst upon a primeval world, bathed it in light, and then as now, invested it with life and clad it in beauty.

THE "WILSONIA."

The "Wilsonia" will cure every form of disease that is curable without medicin of any kind, change of diet or occupation. Magnetism is all that is needed when any portion of the human organism is deranged. It is by the forces of magnetism that the stars are kept in their orbits, and the heavenly bodies bear witness to God's omniscience in his first grand conception of so simple a method as the polarization of ultimate atoms, whereby the repellant and attractiv forces thus inhering keep constant and in order all vegetable, animal, and mineral life, there being even in minerals ample evidence of life forces, although to our senses they may appear dead.

The forces of cohesion in mineral and aeriform bodies are but modifications of the same magnetic law, and the disintegration and breaking up of the atoms forming the mass is only another form of death; actual death cannot be; all is changed; nothing ever dies; its form is alone altered. Disease, therefore, is nothing more than an alteration of polarities, whereby the organism is disarranged. If, therefore, we can by any means keep the peculiar polarities of our organic structure in perfect unison, then disease cannot be; and knowing as we do that the blood is the regulator of our being by virtue of its circulation, such circulation being animated by electric nerve fluids keeping in constant magnetic condition the atoms of iron in the blood; but when nature be impaired or exhausted, then any perfect artificial magnetization will restore the diseased organism, no matter what name may hav been given to the malady.

THE "WILSONIA"

Magnetic Garments are nature's true remedy for every ill, and there is not in the world such testimony as can be found here, in Brooklyn and New York, as to the wonderful yet simple treatment of disease.

The "WILSONIA" will cure any of the following forms of disease:

Paralysis,
Inflammatory Rheumatism,
Anchylasis,
Asthma,
Bronchitis,
Inflammation of the Lungs
Heart Disease,
Albuminous Urine,
Locomotor Ataxia,
Gout,
Varicose Veins,
Catarrh,
Pneumonia,
Bleeding at the Lungs,
Congestion of the Kidneys,
Spinal Disease.

Evidence of this we can giv from the experience of over THIRTY THOUSAND persons.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.
Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

"Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

"The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in h's skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

SUPPOSING that man has descended from a lower animal form, there appears to be ground at least for surmising that vice, instead of being a diabolical inspiration or a mysterious element of human nature, is the remnant of the lower animal not yet eliminated; while virtue is the effect by which that remnant is being gradually worked off. The acknowledged connection of virtue with the ascendancy of the social over the selfish desires and tendencies seems to correspond with this view; the nature of the lower animals being, as far as we can see, almost entirely selfish, and admitting no regard even for the present interests of their kind, much less for its interests in the future.—Goldwin Smith's Lectures and Reviews.

THE lowest races are idolaters; next come polytheists, who see God in all the numerous manifestations of nature, gods good and gods evil, many and fearful; then come a more intelligent class, who believe in a trinity of gods, father, son, and ghost; then still up on the scale you find a class of thinkers who are pure Theists, who worship one great and good spirit or power only; then lastly at the very top, on the apex itself, stand the grandest, noblest philosophers of all who, believing in pure science, dispense with all the fetiches, gods, and spirits, and cling only to what can be proved and demonstrated.—Elmina D. Slenker.

GREAT thinker as Pythagoras was, yet we find him giving forth to the people that he had been for many months in hell. Doubtless of him, as of all the most thoughtful, ordinary folk might whisper as the people of Venice whispered when the solitary Dante passed by them, "See, there is the man that was in hell!" For the loftiest men and women do not reach their sublime hights without passing through tribulation, whereof the every-day world knows nothing and can know nothing.—Dr. Aveling's Science and Secularism.

AMBITION this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter scorn a sacrifice
And grinning infamy.
The stings of falsehood those shall try
And hard unkindness's altered eye,
That mocks the tear it forced to flow;
And keen remorse, with blood defiled,
And moody madness, laughing wild,
Amid severest woe. —Gray's Eton College.

BUT which of you, having a servant plowing or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat? And will not rather say unto him, make ready wherewith I may sleep, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I hav eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink. Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not.—Luke xvii, 7-9.

YOU hav among you many a purchased slave
Which, like your asses, your dogs, and mules,
You use in abject and in slavish parts
Because you bought them. Shall I say to you,
Let them be free; marry them to your heirs?
Why sweat they under burdens? Let their beds
Be made as soft as yours and let their palates
Be seasoned with such viands? You will answer,
"The slaves are ours." So do I answer you.
Shylock, Merchant of Venice.

THE day began to break as we descended into Marseilles. It was Sunday; but the town seemed only the gayer. At last the noise of bells guided me to a chapel mean inside and mean outside, but crowded. The mass was nearly over. I stayed to the end, wondering that so many reasonable beings could come together to see a man bow, drink, bow again, wipe a cup, wrap up a napkin, spread his arms and gesticulate with his hands; and to hear a low muttering which they could not understand interrupted by the occasional jingling of a bell.—Macaulay's Life and Letters.

IF that last day—the day of death—does not occasion an entire extinction, but a change of abode only, what can be more desirable? If it, on the other hand, destroys or absolutely puts an end to us, what can be preferable to the having a deep sleep fall on us in the midst of the fatigues of life, and being thus overtaken, to sleep through eternity?—Cicero.

WE do not regret that we did not exist in the ages of the past. Why feel sad at the contemplation of unconsciousness in ages to come? But as unpleasant as is this thought to those rationalists who are accustomed to regard as probable a blissful immortality for all mankind, how pleasing the reflection of an eternal sleep in comparison with, or rather in contrast to, the expectation that, while a few will be happy thereafter, the majority of our race will exist forever in excruciating and unremitting torment!—B. F. Underwood.

FOR my part I am willing to giv up heaven if we can get rid of hell. I had rather there should be no heaven than that one solitary soul should suffer for ever and ever. But in the Old Testament there is not, in my judgment, a single reference to another life. The idea of eternal life is certainly not born of any book. That wave of hope and joy ebbs and flows and will continue to ebb and flow as long as love kisses the lips of death.—Ingersoll's Hell.

BOTH Mohammedanism and Buddhism hav defects and so has Christianity; it teaches the barbarous doctrin of eternal torment, the superstition of diabolical possessions, the efficacy of prayer, the subordination of woman to man, a personal devil, and many other vagaries. It extols poverty and denounces riches; restricts divorce to adultery on the part of woman; commands submission to tyranny; teaches that twelve disciples will sit on twelve thrones judging the world, etc. The miracles of Christianity are sustained by no reliable history; it has no original doctrins; it contains nothing that man could not learn by his unassisted powers, and it is undergoing improvement in proportion as man becomes enlightened. All the evidence that the case admits of demonstrates that the Bible is an outgrowth of the human mind, an evolution of human thought, a work made up of books belonging to different ages, but all composed by man.—Underwood's Authority of the Bible.

Odds and Ends.

A ROD and lyin' catch the biggest fish of the season.

THE heat, the heat, the beautiful heat!
How it bakes the tin roofs and the bricks at your feet,
How it melts down your collar and musses your hair,
And makes the air thick with full many a swear.

AFTER TENNYSON.

Break! break! break!
My cups and saucers, you lout;
But I'm glad my tongue can't utter
The oaths that my soul points out.

My stately vases go
To your uncle's, I ween, to be cashed;
But oh! for the light of my broken lamp,
Or the tick of my clock that is smashed.

Oh! well for the china-shop man,
Who gets a fresh order each day;
Oh! deucedly well for yourself,
Who are in the said china man's pay.

Break! break! break!
At the foot of my stairs in glee,
But the cash I've spent for the glass you hav cracked,
Will never come back to me. —Unknown Liar.

GOOD FOR FLIES.—"Say, do you know what's good for flies?" queried a Woodward avenue butcher as he entered a drug store the other day.

"I guess I can put you up something for about a quarter," was the reply.

When the dose was ready the butcher was told to pour it out on plates and set them on the counter, and he hurried away to giv it a trial. In about an hour he sent for the druggist to come over. The 10 000 flies in the shop before the dose was fixed had been multiplied by four.

"Great lands! but I'm being carried off by flies!" exclaimed the butcher as he waved a long knife around his head.

"Well, why don't you get something to kill 'em off?"

"Didn't I, but it hasn't killed a one."

"Of course it hasn't. You wanted something good for flies, and I gave you clarified syrup! It's the best stuff to draw flies and keep 'em contented I ever heard of. Why didn't you tell me you wanted a fly-killer?"—Detroit Free Press.

WEATHER INDICATIONS.

It is an easy matter enough to forecast the weather like Prof. Tice and Mr. Vennor, if people will only giv their minds to it. By closely reading and studying the predictions of these great weather-breeders we hav deduced the following rules by which he makes all his forecasts; hind casts of the weather are not made until the next day: An intensely blue sky indicates a temporary absence of clouds. Under other circumstances, again, an intensely blue sky indicates a tornado. When a woman leaves a piece of soap on the stairs where her husband will tread upon it, it is a dead sure sign of a storm. When the sun rises behind a bank of clouds, and the clouds hang low all around the horizon, and all over the sky, and the air feels damp and there is a fine drizzling mist blowing, the indications are there will be a rain somewhere in the United States or Canada. When it begins to thunder look out for lightning. When a man gets up in the night, and feels along the top pantry shelf in the dark, and knocks the big square bottle without any label down to the floor and breaks it, it is a sign there is going to be a dry spell until seven or eight o'clock in the morning. When the spring millinery openings are advertised, look for bright, sunny weather all around the house, with treacherous calms and rising barometer, indicativ of sudden tempests and mean temperature. When the cradle begins to vibrate with irregular, spasmodic motions about 1 o'clock in the morning look out for signals and try to remember where you put the paregoric the last time you used it. When the youngest boy in the family comes home three hours after school hours, with his hair wet and his shirt wrong side out, look out for a spanking breeze. To see the head of the family feeling in his right hand pocket, then in the left hand pocket then in all his vest pockets, then in his hip pocket then in his coat pockets, and then look at the ceiling, indicates "no change." If he suddenly stop whistling at the ceiling, and expands his face into a broad grimace of delight, it means "unexpected change." If the spring bonnet comes home trimmed on the right side for the wearer's seat in church, and has two more sprigs and three more dandelions than the bonnet of the woman in the next pew, it is "set fair." An unusually large number of spiders presages a very mild or a very open winter, as the case may be. If the corn-husks are very thick the winter will be colder than the summer. If the corn-husks are very thin the summer will be warmer than the winter. If the corn-husks are neither too thin nor too thick, the summer will be warm and the winter will be cold. If the weather prophet predicts a rainy season, and it happens to rain away out in Calaveras county and is as dry as a bone all over the rest of America, this rain must be set down to the credit of the weather-breeder, and all the dry time counts for nothing. If the weather-breeder predicts a very dry month, and the raging floods sweep all the country in one wild, drowning deluge, except Newton Upper Falls, Massachusetts, then people must say that sure enough old Vennor said it was going to be dry this month. Still, it is just as well to bear in mind, when you read the wild prognostications of Mr. Vennor and his great rival, that a rain 1,500 miles square no more makes a rainy day on this continent than a fly-speck on the dome of the Capitol makes the district of Columbia, or even all of the dome, black. Anybody can say, "There will be rain and thunder storms and cyclones in the United States during July," and it would be a mighty safe thing to bet money on. What we want, what the country clamors for, is a man who can tell us when and where the cyclone is going to strike, and whom it will hit. And up to date that man hasn't said a word about the weather.—Burlington Hawkeye.

A WORTHY deacon in a town not far away gave notice at the prayer-meeting the other night of a church meeting that was to be held immediately after, and unconsciously added, "There is no objection to the female brethren remaining!"

"THE mainspring of Italian music in the eighteenth century," says a recent writer, "was the exclusiv and passionate worship of the human voice." But Italian music has experienced a change. Its mainspring is now in a box, and is worked with a handle.

A LEADING Sunday-school organ asks: "Hav you been to any of the summer Sunday-school assemblies? If you hav, what suggestion that you hav received there are you going to make practically useful?" A great many suggestions occur to the wide-awake teacher who has visited these gatherings. One is that most of them are run in the interest of a real estate ring which owns the property. Another is that, owing to the desire for the copious influx of "gate money," the attractions are, in some cases, more sensational than profitable. Another is that if the sanitary conveniences are not made better on some of the "assembly" grounds the overcrowded and underfed patrons will be stricken with pestilence. A fourth suggestion is that the beef and mutton furnished at these places ought not to be as tough as they generally are.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, has reached these shores. We received a hasty line from him merely announcing his arrival at Glasgow, and saying that he will be in London shortly. Any communications for Mr. Bennett may be addreseed to our office.—London Republican.

MANY of the recent emigrants from Germany are young men under eighteen, who thus escape the long and burdensome military service. Were they to remain until their eighteenth year their emigration would not be permitted. Bismarck is reported not to like their departure at all. He is alarmed to find his stock of food for powder so rapidly diminishing.

DANIEL JONES, an aged bank president at Watertown, Wisconsin, and Charles Wood, an equally aged manufacturer, hav both been regarded in their community as pattern men. Nevertheless, they had a desperate fight over the discounting of a note, and Mr. Jones was so badly whipped that it was doubtful for a time whether he would recover.

THE modern Athens has not hitherto been as conscientious in the use she has made of her finest concert hall as New York. While Steinway and Chickering Halls can only be secured for strictly first-class entertainments, Boston Music Hall has been constantly desecrated by poultry and dog shows, prize-fights, and Joseph Cook's lectures on modern science. But now that the majority of the stock has been transferred to the generous and art-loving Mr. Higginson, it is to be hoped that the hall will no longer be disgraced by such exhibitions.—Post.

OUR memory recalls no "giv-away" so delightfully innocent as that of the Catholic bishop of Ohio, who, in a recent proclamation ordering a certain number of prayers per day in his diocese for the recovery of President Garfield, gravely added that, "in case of the President's death, the prayers should be continued during the week following that event for the welfare of the country." That is to say, having prayed the President to death, his priests must next try to pray the country to death. It is impossible to caricature the Christian system, there being a point beyond which absurdity cannot go.—Liberty.

THE Discharge of Contumacious Prisoners bill is intended to open the prison doors to those disobedient clergymen whose defiance of Lord Penzance and the Church Association has led to their incarceration. The noble members of the Upper House are deeply interested in the maintenance of the church of England, and hence their readiness to pass a measure intended to put an end to such long-continued scandals as that of the confinement of the Rev. F. S. Green. At the most, however, this new act will prove only a whitening of the sepulcher; inside, the Established church is not a whit less rotten, less divided against itself, less simoniacal than it was before. Let ecclesiastical tinkers do what they may toward bolstering it up, the whole edifice is on the point of bursting asunder, and another generation will find our state church reckoned among the things that were.—Secular Review.

THE case of the Rev. Dr. Hiram W. Thomas, of Chicago, has reached the first stage in its journey. The starting point was in July last, when members of the Chicago District Rock River Conference charged Dr. Thomas with disseminating doctrins contrary to the doctrins of the Methodist faith in denying the inspiration and authority of portions of the Bible; secondly, in denying the doctrin of the atonement as held by the Methodist church; and, thirdly, in teaching a probation after death to those who die in sin, thereby antagonizing the standards of the Methodist church. The case came up for a preliminary hearing in Chicago on Monday last, and after five days of pretty hard work the investigating committee decided that there was enough truth in the charges to warrant Dr. Thomas being tried by the Rock River Conference. The decision is claimed to be a virtual verdict of guilty.

THE Salvation Army in Philadelphia is not making proper progress in attacking the strongholds of sin. The ungodly go to the meetings, but it is to scoff; and instead of remaining to pray, they continue to scoff. This is very trying to the soldiers of the Salvation Army. When, the other night, the scoffers attacked Comrade Robinson, a colored brother who attempted to preserve order, then forbearance came to an end. Major More, Lieutenant Morgan, and Comrade Frank showed that they were indeed fighters. The entrance of the police prevented loss of life, but the solemnity of that meeting was ruined. These things, however, do not discourage the Army, for the next evening Comrade Robinson remarked: "I want you young fellows there on the back seats to understand that I ain't going to hav no more fooling around here. We're going to hav order if it breaks my back." His course of action, while it shows the pluck of the Army, is not apt to convince sinners of the error of their ways or to awaken the impenitent.

SOME inquisitor has made the discovery that of the twenty American Presidents, only two, Washington and Garfield, were members of any religious denomination, though all of them, for the sake of appearances, sometimes attended public worship. The statement that "all of them revered Christianity" is more doubtful if the word "revere" is intended to express anything stronger than respect. Both the Adamses rejected the doctrin of the divinity of Jesus; so did Jefferson; so did Lincoln; so also did Filmore. As that doctrin is one of the essential corner-stones of Christianity, to say that those who rejected it "revered Christianity" is putting the matter somewhat too strongly.—Chicago Times. We think the Times mistaken. Washington was a Deist, and did not particularly "revere" Christianity, and we are informed that President Garfield and his wife hav evoluted into being very Liberal in their theology, and that that is the reason no priest has hovered around the sick bed at the White House. Probably Hayes was the only simon-pure orthodox President. We admit he was a Christian without one redeeming trait.

AN aged clergyman on Thursday last, while praying for the recovery of the President, was stricken with paralysis. At the beginning almost of a prayer his voice began to tremble, and soon became inaudible. The congregation were dismissed, and the old man was taken to his home. This circumstance might be cited as evidence of divine displeasure at the act in which the venerable minister was engaged. But not by us. Whether prayer for the President is available or not, the noble purpose was the same. And whatever may be the motivs of some, the sincerity of this aged man, whose hairs hav grown gray in the service of his church, should be free from all doubt. Himself prostrate before an open grave, from which he besought the Deity to save the President, and with a stricken family about him, his is no case to use for illustration in religious controversy. The laws of nature brought him face to face with death at a moment when he was offering a prayer for the health of another; but decency and a reasonable regard for the emotions of others forbid that this circumstance should be appealed to to prove that what he was doing when death found him was an impious act. Opinions which cannot be sustained by better arguments, and illustrated in a spirit more humane, must indeed be unworthy opinions. And yet we hav a recollection of reading, and in religious publications, too, arguments and illustrations precisely such as this would be. They were used, however, to sustain opinions diametrically the reverse of those in behalf of which the sad circumstance to which we hav alluded might be used.—Truth.

THE Rev. Jacob Mulford committed suicide on Sept. 8th at his home in Philadelphia. He appeared one Sunday morning drunk in his pulpit, was relieved of his charge by his congregation, and a few days after was found dead with a bottle of whisky in his hand. Some laudanum was discovered upon his table.

THURSDAY, the 8th, was set apart by the governors of several states, including New York, as a day of fasting and prayer for the recovery of the President. It was observed to some extent in this city, many business houses closing their doors. On Friday, President Garfield, whose removal to Long Branch had been safely accomplished, was reported better. Since then, however, an abscess has been discovered to hav formed on one of his lungs, which will necessitate a severe surgical operation, and there are indications of other similar formations on the liver and other lung. Tuesday he sat up for half an hour.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Without delay I executed my resolution, as much as Mr. Bertollon opposed it. He finally had to yield to my wishes. I departed without even attempting a farewell call upon Madame Bertollon.

Soon, in the quietude of rural nature, I recovered from my intoxication. I felt it, that I had never truly and purely loved Madame Bertollon, and despised myself for having exhibited feelings toward her that I never possessed. It was nothing but an intoxication of my senses originated by that unfortunate love which the handsome woman could not conceal from me. She alone was to be pitied, and my duty it was to giv to her her lost peace.

As from dense fog my mind gradually emerged to its former clearness, and Clementine's picture stood brighter and more charming before me than ever, I had, at my flight from Montpellier, left behind wreath and harp. Not that I had wholly forgotten Clementine at that time, but shame and a sacred timidity repulsed me when I wanted to touch the venerated relic I believed to be worthy of her no more, and considered the pang of longing and separation only a light penance for my crime.

Four weeks passed by. Bertollon alone visited me. He came often. "For I cannot liv without thee, and yet my affairs tie me to that unfortunate city," said he.

He made several attempts to induce me to return to Montpellier, but in vain. I remained in my quieting solitude and felt happier.

CHAPTER XIX.

One morning I was awakened early by the servant. "Mr. Larette is without; he wants to see you absolutely at once!" said he, and Larette, one of Bertollon's friends, at the same time entered the room pale and disturbed.

"Arise!" cried he, "and come at once to Montpellier."

"What is the matter?" asked I, frightened.

"Arise, dress yourself. You hav not a moment to lose. Bertollon is poisoned and on the point of death."

"Poisoned?" stammered I, and sank almost fainting in my bed.

"Only hurry! He wishes to see you yet. I hav galloped hither by his order!"

I tremblingly dressed myself. Strengthless I followed him to the door. A buggy stood awaiting us. We took our seats and flew to Montpellier.

"Poisoned?" I asked again on the way.

"Certainly," replied Larette; "yet there is an incomprehensible mystery in the affair. A fellow, who got the poison at the drug-store, is in jail. Also Madame Bertollon is arrested in her room."

"Madame Bertollon? Arrested? Why arrested? Who had her arrested?"

"The magistrate."

"The magistrate? Fancies also the police of Montpellier such madness? Believes the magistrate that Madame Bertollon could hav poisoned her husband?"

"He believes it, and everybody ——"

"Sir, you shug your shoulders? And everybody —well continue; what were you about to say?"

"That everybody believes it. The fellow, Valentin, I think he is called ——"

"How? Valentin? Right, the old, faithful family servant, the most honest soul under the sun!"

"Well, he has told to hav bought poison about a week ago by order of Madame Bertollon."

"The infernal liar, that ——"

"And on being examined about the declaration of the servant, Madame Bertollon, without hesitation, admitted it. There, you hav it all."

"Admitted? I am as one out of his senses; I do not comprehend you. What has she admitted?"

"That she had ordered Valentin to get the poison."

"Horrible! And also that it was she who had poisoned, killed her own husband?"

"Who would willingly own such a thing? After all 'tis to be so. Bertollon had again yesterday morning one of his usual attacks; you know he is subject to dizziness. He asked his wife, as she possessed in her room a small family dispensary, to giv him the customary drops, a very costly essence, which Madame Bertollon brought to him in a blue, gilded, glass flask."

"I know it very well, and also the essence."

"She herself poured the medicin into the spoon, added sugar, and gave it to her husband. After a while he felt the most violent pains in his bowels. The physician came. He recognized the symptoms of poison. There were found traces of it in the essence that remained in the spoon. The physician did his utmost to save him. He demanded the essence for examination. Madame Bertollon became sensitiv, and asked whether they believed her to be a poisoner. Finally, as she could no longer deny the surrender of the little flask without creating suspicion, she gave it up. Meanwhile several physicians had hastened hither, and also an officer of the police. The affair had become known. The druggist recollected the poison bought by Valentin, and informed the police office. Valentin was immediately arrested. He appealed to the order of his mistress. Madame Bertollon was asked authoritativly about it. She sank down in a swoon. They demanded of her all the keys, examined her dispensary, and found the poison, which was recognized by the summoned druggist; there was wanting only a part in the weight. In the mean time the essence in the little blue flask had been analyzed, and the poison discovered therein. So stands the case. Now think what you please about it, sir."

I shuddered, and spoke not a syllable. I perceived through it all a terrible linking of circumstances, which neither Larette nor any other outsider could imagin. She loved me with an awful strength; our separation increased her passion instead of diminishing it. So she fell upon the infamous plan of ridding herself of her husband. I recollected her fiery, passionate character, of which Bertollon had spoken to me before. I remembered my last conversation with her, and how I had imprudently told her that I had open-heartedly acquainted her husband with our relation; and how she was frightened at that, and inquired deeper into Bertollon's conduct.

The probability increased in me to a frightful certainty. I could well comprehend how the black thought might hav ripened within her; I saw her mix the accursed bowl, and, blinded by her passion, handing it to the unfortunate Bertollon.

We arrived in Montpellier. I wanted to enter the room of my dear benefactor. "Is he still alive?" cried I, yet at the foot of the stairs. I was ordered in a whisper to be quiet. I was denied the entrance to his room. He had sunk into a gentle slumber, which did him good, and was a quieting proof of his recovery.

"And where is Madame Bertollon?" asked I.

I was told that she had left the house very early that morning, and had moved to her relations, where she, under bail of the whole family, had received house-arrest. It was only with difficulty, and through the influence of her relativs, that the disgrace of imprisonment was spared her. I was told in confidence that Mr. Bertollon himself, through a friend, had given her the advice to fly to Italy before it was too late. She had been undecided. Her own brothers had tried to induce her to make use of her short liberty. But her pride had conquered. Her word had been, "I shall not flee, for with that I would plead guilty to a crime of which I am not yet and cannot be convicted."

CHAPTER XX.

Beauty of form is charming only inasmuch as we accept it as a silent proof of a beautiful soul. It loses all power, nay, fills us with terror, if it is the ornament of a criminal. The artist may paint sin beautiful on the threshold of hell, and this becomes, by using the most loved and touching ideas of humanity as the tools of its wickedness, a thousand times more fearful.

No longer without abhorrence could I think of Madame Bertollon. She was a poison-mixer, and all that which Larette had hastily related to me was confirmed in Montpellier, and a multitude of peculiar circumstances continually spread more light over the assassin's deed.

All Montpellier was disturbed through this extraordinary, event Bertollon's gradual recovery, through the skill of the physician, created in every house the greatest joy. I left no more the bedside of my dear friend, whom I venerated as a brother, as a father.

"O Bertollon!" I cried, "thou art saved! Woe unto me, if thou hadst perished! My grief would not hav suffered me to survive thy death very long. Behold, thou art my only friend, the only one I hav on earth; thou art my benefactor, my guardian angel. Every moment I am ready to die for thee. And is it possible? Could a woman, such a tender, timid being, a woman endowed with such heavenly charms, a woman whose eyes and lips so sweetly preached virtue, be so horrible?"

"Dost thou love her yet, Alamontada?" asked Bertollon, while he pressed my hand.

"Love? The thought is shocking to me. I hav never loved her; only belittling vanity, only sensual deception it was, that I once in intoxication termed love. I hav never loved her. A secret power always kept my heart at a distance from hers. How can I love the one that wanted to kill thee? I curse every hour that I lived in the society of the poison-mixer, and regret the love caresses that I wasted on her. Alas, I did not know her!"

Meanwhile the prosecution against the wife of Bertollon had begun. But the most renowned advocate of Montpelier, Mr. Menard, offered himself voluntarily to the family of the accused one to become her defender in court. Menard had never yet lost a cause. The charm of his eloquence conquered everything; where he could not convince reason, he knew how to entangle it in inextricable doubts, and again to set in commotion all feelings of the heart. When he spoke in court, the halls were filled with listeners, who, for his sake, often came from distant regions. He undertook, and never unsuccessfully, even the most difficult causes, when he could expect to be richly rewarded.

"I ask nothing," said Bertollon, "but that I be separated from the poison-mixer forever. I insist upon no other punishment for her unsuccessful attempt. Her own conscience and public contempt are thorns enough for her. Menard is, I know it, personally opposed to me. He was once my rival. I see beforehand that he will, through his artifices, blindfold and confuse judges and people to such an extent that my shameless wife will, after all, triumphantly emerge from this affair."

"That he will not!" cried I with fiery enthusiasm, "I beg thee, Bertollon, although I am only a beginner, who never spoke in court, entrust me with thy affair. Trust me and the just cause. It does not hurt me at all to enter the tribunal against a woman whom I once called friend, and who has drowned me in criminal favors. Thou art my brother, my benefactor; thy cause is a sacred one."

Bertollon smiled; but he expressed to me at the same time his fears that I was not a match for the skill of my opponent. He consented, finally, and apparently with fear, to my proposal that his cause should become the first trial of my skill.

"Be not anxious, dear Bertollon!" said I; "friendship will make me enthusiastic, and uphold me if I should once falter under Menard's powers. And with all his cunning he will not be able to deny away facts that his client has all too hastily admitted."

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER I.

THE BOOKS OF MOSES.

Christianity is founded upon Judaism;* let us see if this sect is really a work of God. If any one givs me the so-called books of Moses, let me first find out whether those books were written by Moses.

1. Is it probable that Moses had the Pentateuch and the other lesser books of the law engraved upon stone, and that he kept engravers and polishers of stone in a naked desert where, it is said, his people had neither tailors, sandal-makers, cloth-cutters, nor the bread to eat, and where God was compelled to perform one continual miracle forty years in order to preserve the garments of his people, and to nourish them?

2. It is said in Joshua that the book of Deuteronomy was written upon an altar made of broken stones laid in mortar. How could a book be written upon mortar so as to last? How did it happen that the letters were not effaced by the blood which was continuously poured upon the altar? How came it that this altar, this monument which preserved for us Deuteronomy, existed so long in a country where the Jews were reduced to such a state of servitude that even their unlawfulness was excusable?

3. The innumerable mistakes in geography, in chronology, and the contradictions which are found in the Pentateuch hav compelled many Jews and many Christians to affirm that the Pentateuch was not written by Moses. The scholar Leclerc and other theologians, and even our Newton, hav held this opinion. It is therefore all the more probable.

Is it not sufficient to judge with common sense a book which commences with these words, "These be the words which Moses spake on this side of the Jordan," to be a mere forgery, since this same book assures us that Moses never had crossed the Jordan?

* Suppose that God had created the petty and cruel sect called the Jews, would it not follow that he had also created the Galileans and other troublesome sects?

Since we take for granted anything to be the truth which is announced by God himself, demonstrated by marvelous deeds, and sealed by human blood, since God himself has said a hundred times that this law of his shall be eternal; since he has declared in his law that any one who abridged or added to his laws must be put to death without pity; since he commanded that any prophet who dared to make a change in his ancient laws by performing miracles should be slain by his best friend, or by his brother; it is clear that Christianity, which discarded Judaism with all its rites in opposition to these commauds, is an erroneous religion and is hostil to God himself.

It is alleged that Christianity is founded upon the Jewish religion. This, to my mind, is the same as if one had said tha. Mohammedanism is founded upon the ancient religion of the Sabeans. Mohammedanism had its origin in the country of the Sabeans, and, far from having its origin in that religion, it destroyed it.

Add to these a still stronger argument. God revealed the law to that man Noah who was ignorant of all other nations except the Jews, and he revealed the law during the reign of Pharaoh, and finally for the third time revealed it during the reign of Tiberius. This pretty little story of God revealing at three different times a universal religion to a miserable, petty, and ignorant people is only characteristic of a mind unable to invent anything more absurd.

The explanation given by Abbad, a poor fool of a Protestant preacher, who lived in Ireland, to wit, the words "that side," in the above quotation from the Pentateuch were intended to mean "this side," is ridiculous.

I ask in the name of reason if it is probable that Moses while in the desert revealed the laws to the Jewish kings who were born so many years after him; whether Moses in the same desert gave forty-eight towns together with extensiv suburbs (Deut. xiv), to a small tribe called the Levites, in addition to the tithes that the other tribes had to pay the Levites? (Numbers, xxxv.) It is without doubt natural that priests should try to swallow these tales.

Had it been necessary to giv as many towns to the other tribes of Jews as were given to the Levites the total would hav been four hundred and eighty towns.

The Jews hav not written their history otherwise than in this foolish style. Each statement is exaggerated in a ridiculous manner. Their histories are full of gross lies and absurd fables.*

[TO BE CONTINUED]

* My lord Bolingbroke contents himself with a limited number of examples. Had he wished he could hav found many hundred more. One of the strongest arguments against these books is found in the books which were supposed to hav been written in the time of Moses and of Joshua, but which were in truth written in the times of the kings, because they are cited in the history of Joshua and of the Jewish kings.

The Catholics call these books the History of the Righteous. When Joshua spoke of the sun standing still upon Gibeon and of the moon arresting her course over Ajalon in mid-day, he cited this History of the Righteous. When the author of the Chronicles or the Books of the Kings speaks of the songs of David written by him upon the death of Saul and of his son Jonathan he cites the Books of the Just. How could this book hav been written in the time of Moses and also in the time of David? This unfortunate discrepancy was not noticed by Lord Bolingbroke. It is really laughable to watch the embarrassment of that innocent man Don Calmet, who seeks in vain to reconcile such absurdities.

Cain's Wife—Who Was She?—Concluded.

BY J. C. N. ABBOTT.

Time rolled on, and for aught they knew or perhaps cared, they were the sole monarchs of the world.

They ceased from traveling, and no traveler had ever invaded their peaceful borders.

Their sons and their daughters grew up as tender plants and as vines around their hearth-stones, and they were married and given in marriage.

They became, as it were, a little world to themselvs. They were neglected or fogotten by God—they grew by neglect—they were happy in themselvs.

But in the mutations of time the results of the marriage of the second man and woman, the man Adam and his wife, began to be apparent. Two sons were born unto them. And as the result of eating those apples, the curse of laboring and sweating being entailed upon their offspring, the children, it so happened that while the two sons were in the field hoeing corn one day, and as the labor of hoeing and sweating probably exasperated the youths, a quarrel arose between them, and so fierce did it at length become that the elder boy, Cain, raised his hoe and struck his younger brother, Abel, upon the head and killed him. This little episode of Cain's appears to hav aroused God's anger toward him to such an extent as to cause him to set a mark upon him, or brand him so that all who saw him might easily recognize him by his brand.

And then God told him to leave; to hie him away to parts unknown, where he would make him a vagabond and an outcast for all time.

But Cain, who had the courage to kill his brother and then deny it as he did, was not the man to be discouraged at any such trifles; and instead of hanging his head and becoming morose and disheartened he shouldered his pack and tramped, and in due time he is heard from as being a resident, and a married man, in the land of Nod.

As to what took place during his journey thither or just how far it was from the land of Eden, where his parents lived, and from which he took his departure, or how long it took him to accomplish the journey, history is silent. We are therefore left to conjecture only in regard to these important facts—important because in the life of all prominent men, and especially those who are our common ancestors, each and every fact bearing any relation to their history becomes intensely interesting to us who come after them.

Doubtless Cain kept a diary of all passing events, and of whatever objects came under his notice during his lonely but eventful journey from the land of Eden to the land of Nod. But the sacred historian has seen fit to leave us in doubt here, as he has failed to make any reference whatever in regard to that memorable journey. This omission on the part of the sacred writer is much to be regretted, because the period covered by such omission forms an epoch in the life and character of this notable man and the influence, yea, the conclusion, is that it was also an epoch of great importance in his history.

But our imagination can in a measure at least supply this deficiency; and in doing so we cannot but feel that Cain's conscience was troubling him—remorse, bitter remorse, in the thought that he had killed his brother, and that perhaps somewhere or sometime in God's providence or universe affliction or punishment might be visited upon him for that act, accidental though it might hav been. Then, too, he was leaving the parental roof, the parents who had nourished him and brought him up, the home of his childhood and youth, with all the tender memories which naturally cluster around home with its hallowed recollections and pleasing associations.

To all these he was bidding adieu, and taking his life in his hand, as it were, he went to parts unknown, and equally was it unknown to him as to what he should find or whom he should meet there. But becoming desperate, as we may suppose, he resolves to make necessity a virtue, and, plucking up courage, he pushes out and on till at length the fair land of Nod appears in the distance. And here again imagination must come to our aid to supply what history has left void and blank.

But, as we hav been credibly informed, the land was very beautiful; it was indeed a magnificent country to look upon. Cain doubtless comprehended all as his eyes rested for the first time upon the lovely and enchanting panorama spread out before him; and with tearful eyes, as we may suppose, and those tears of joy of course, he then beheld such a beautiful land which might soon be his, in part at least, outcast though he was from his home, his parents, and his God, and as he pressed forward to enter it he yearns to see and to know all in regard to the land and its people, if indeed it contained a people, as he ignorantly supposed it did not.

These and many other equally important cogitations, it is apprehended, passed rapidly through the mind of our hero Cain, as he plodded diligently along the way to the land of Nod, that fine land wherein dwelt one who in the order of divine providence was destined to be his bosom companion, his wife, together with her parents and all her family relations, and which in the order of destiny was likewise soon to become his home with all its endearing relations. The prospect now immediately before him, notwithstanding his peculiar situation of banishment from his nativ home, encouraged him in a high degree to persevere and enter the land which he beheld with so much beauty. He was probably spurred on by the stings of those bitter admonitions and threatenings which he had received from his God, hoping and believing that whatever things were before him and in store for him in the future, they at least could be no worse than those he was leaving behind him.

But at length Cain arrives in the land of Nod. He beholds the fair daughters of that land, and considering the injunction which God laid upon his parents as equally binding upon himself as one of their posterity, to wit, that they should be fruitful, multiply, and replenish the earth, he at once, and for the first time in his life, began seriously to consider the important subject of a matrimonial alliance with one of those lovely and charming maidens with which the land of Nod seemed prolific. But the contemplation of this subject was of short duration ere Cain resolved upon action instead of theorizing; and suiting his action to his resolution, he proposed, was accepted, and took to himself a wife from among the daughters of the land of Nod.

And here our story, and our duty as a chronicler and a faithful and true interpreter of one of the most important events recorded in Holy Writ might end, were it not that some very inquisitiv people ask us, in addition to all this, to explain to them the relationship, if any existed, between Cain's wife's parents and those of his own parents, or between the first pair and Adam and Eve.

Well, since we hav satisfactorily explained the knotty problem, this long-mooted question as to Mrs. Cain's ancestry, her genealogy, we are not at all reluctant in undertaking to solve the metaphysical question as to the consanguinity of those two pairs of people. We remark first, then, that owing to the absence of documentary proof this question at first view would seem difficult of solution, as the proof must be more inferential than absolute. Nevertheless we will venture to giv an opinion. In the first place it must be observed that in the production of the first pair no particular effort was put forth. They simply came forth by the speaking of God, by the simple word of his power. He only had to speak, and presto, they came. They came upon the scene, we may believe, simultaneous with each other. In fact is is believed that the pair came hand in hand together. They were very original, and no doubt quite independent of any and all other beings. They were given to understand that the earth with all its fruits, and the fulness thereof, was theirs.

There was no reservation made of anything. It was all theirs. They evidently accepted the gift with thanks, and without delay they set out to fulfil the divine command to multiply and appropriate the promised fruits, which at that early day seemed rather scarce in those parts, and hence they resolved to travel in quest of a land that should be more prolific. And they went to the land of Nod, where the hero of our story found them and his wife.

So much for the history of pair No. 1, or the magic pair. They came as if by magic, but were real nevertheless.

Now, mark, when God came to look for them on the morning of the eighth day, behold, they had skipped the place and left for parts unknown; they could not be found; they were non est.

But without them God's creativ work was imperfect—his crowning piece was wanting. And from the remarks which he made we infer that he searched for them diligently, and failing in finding them, he declared that there was not a man to till the ground.

It is evident that God was either disappointed in not finding the pair which he had made on the sixth day, or else he must hav forgotten that he had made them. At all events, he went to work and made another pair right then and there; and now he tells us just how it was done, to wit: By wetting up a little dust, rolling it into the proper shape, and then breathing into it the breath of life. And then, as if in fear that this man might skip as the other did, he immediately went to work and with his own hands planted a garden full of all manner of trees, and it is supposed that he hedged this garden around so that his man No. 2 could not get out. But in consequence of his eating that apple—one of those Baldwins—he was turned out—driven out with a strong reprimand, which involved fearful consequences.

And now, gravely considering the manner in which each of the two pairs were brought upon the stage, together with all the attending circumstances, these beings, so diverse, the one coming by magic and the other by a simple process of manufacture, by manipulation, notwithstanding that they both came from or through the hands of the same manipulator, we are constrained to giv it as our unbiased, mature, and deliberate judgment that there was not a particle of blood relationship existing between them.

And this, we think, must ever stand as the judgment of the world as they come to a true knowledge of the history of those two remarkable men and their families.

In conclusion, then, we remark, first, that there were two pairs of men and women created (made at about the beginning of things), and that the first pair that were made were the parents, or grandparents, of Mrs. Cain, and they were the original first pair; and that Cain's parents were an after consideration, a second creation, and the second pair brought into existence; and that the two pairs were in no way related to each other, each having been originated in a very different way and at different times, hence it was legitimate and proper that Cain and his wife should marry as they did.

The Iowa Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The First Annual Convention of the Iowa Liberal League will meet at Cedar Rapids, Saturday, September 24th, and will continue over Sunday and Monday, perhaps Tuesday. Three sessions daily after Saturday.

We confidently expect that to this gathering will come the working Liberals of Iowa, attracted, not by flaming posters announcing the expected presence of scores of great orators, but drawn hither by a sincere desire to do something to help humanity in its devious and arduous march onward and upward. To be sure, good speakers will be on hand to please and enlighten by means of the ever-loved charms of the orator. But we think that it is time that we ceased to depend wholly upon the fame of the speaker to assemble our cohorts in yearly conclave. Our cause involves more than a mere holiday parade. We hav to organize for long, persistent, and terrible battle with the leagued legions of oppression and privilege; we hav to combine to educate our children in nature's lore, that they may not be cursed by lie of priest and statesman's craft, and we hav to overcome the opposition of all those who believe that to "meddle is to mar," epecially if your meddling is with established religious opinions and time-honored customs and institutions.

Then to this Convention there should come the men and women who are in earnest; who desire to leave the world better, more intelligent than they found it; who do not believe that non-belief in an endless hell is any excuse for ceasing to labor in the cause of humanity; who are aware that in renouncing the old supernatural beliefs we hav incurred an added responsibility to our fellows, and who know that a Liberal is something more than a denier of Christian teachings.

Then we hav the annual business of the League to attend to, the election of delegates to the Fifth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, and much else of importance.

Come and help us sing the songs of freedom and join your voices with ours in the discussion of practicable and practical reform. Let me hear from you. Contribute what you may feel able toward expenses of Convention.

The Hornellsville Convention.

The Erie railroad is noted for its comfortable cars and good road-bed, but the long spell of dry weather lately has rendered riding on any road, even the best, very disagreeable, and we were therefore glad when the conductor said Hornellsville was the next stopping-place. We got there late Monday night, and went immediately to sleep. Tuesday morning we started out to arrange about our business, preparatory to the convention which began Wednesday. Dr. Shattuck was repairing his beautiful Opera House, and as no business could be done in the forenoon we had a half day to look the town over. Hornellsville is a pretty place lying down among a lot of very high hills. It is the end of a division of the Erie road, and the railroad business is its principal support. Its eight or ten thousand inhabitants are pious. There are not over fifty Liberals in the town and they are quiet, with the exception of the generous Opera House proprietor. Dr. Shattuck is known all over town as the Infidel. In season and out he dispenses truth, and he is fortunate in being independent enough to do it. With these honorable exceptions Hornellsville is very blue in its orthodoxy. The Y. M. C. A. has established a reading-room there, but we did not see many availing themselvs of the opportunity to get theological reading free. Probably the railroad boys, for whose ostensible use the room was fitted up, prefer to amuse themselvs after the day's work is done. Railroad men are not apt to be pious, except the track laborers, who are mostly Irish Catholics. After looking the town over we returned to the Opera House and procured the services of a carpenter to put up our little book-stand. As he was a Liberal he did not bankrupt us by his price. The Christians of the town appeared to think that the convention was of the devil and only to be tolerated as the Freethinkers had to liv and they could put money in their purses by boarding them. The ministers of the place talked and worked against the convention. Sunday they preached against it, and on several days distributed tracts in the vicinity of the different hotels. Their pious exhortations may hav had some effect, for the towns-people who came into the convention were not numerous. It may hav been the fear of hades or the ten-cent admission fee charged in the evenings that kept them away. One good Christian who lived seven miles out in the country heard that the Freethinkers were having a convention, and Friday evening he hitched up his horse and brought his family in, much, we suppose, as he did to attend the circus which exhibited there Saturday. On arriving at the Opera House, and seeing the ticket-office open with Bro. Bell's jolly countenance beaming from the window, he walked up, followed by the female Christians of his establishment, and asked if an admission was charged. "Ten cents," answered Mr. Bell. "What! charge to hear an Infidel preach!" almost shrieked the disciple of Calvin; "I won't pay it, never!" and he walked away like a turkey gobbler, with his brood after him, while Bell and the vice-editor added an ounce or two to their avoirdupois by some quiet laughter. The old gent probably paid $50 or $75 a year to support his preacher, who told little but lies, but when it came to ten cents to hear a good lecture he backed out. He may think that Liberal lecturers liv on air, but he knows preachers don't. The old man is not alone in his parsimony toward supporting Liberal lecturers. We heard a Liberal say that when he was a church-member he gave annually $100, but since he has become emancipated he has not spent over $10 or $15 a year, and he reproached himself for it. Many are just like him, only they don't reproach themselvs.

Tuesday night the attendants upon the Convention began to drop in, and every train brought a few. S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., came Monday, and Tuesday afternoon we had a quiet chat with him. W. S. Bell, and H. L. Green arrived Tuesday night, along with Dr. T. L. Brown, the president of the association. W. F. Peck, the musician of the meeting, was also on hand early. Mr. Green had advertised the Convention well in the local papers of central and western New York, and the Liberals of the state and Pennsylvania came out numerously. But those living further off could not get there, and we missed seeing many that we had hoped to. We were particularly pleased to meet S. D. Moore and Wm. Edmundson, of Renova, Pa., two of the oldest and stanchest friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER; also W. W. Dunham and L. DeWitt Griswold. The largest attendance was upon the last days, when T. B. Wakeman, Geo. Chainey, S. P. Putnam, and T. C. Leland put in an appearance. Mrs. H. S. Lake was in attendance most of the time and spoke twice very acceptably to her many admirers. We had to regret the absence of Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith, and C. Fannie Allyn, whom we had been led to suppose would be there. Col. Ingersoll, too, was prevented by prior engagements from giving the Convention one of his brilliant speeches, and it was owing to his absence as much as anything that the Convention was not more fully attended.

The meeting was called to order Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and Dr. T. L. Brown gave the opening address, which was upon "The Science and Art of Health, in its Relations to Right Living." It was crowded with sensible suggestions, put out in Dr. Brown's peculiarly direct manner, and if its ideas were carried into practice there would be fewer sick people. The doctor's ideas are in direct opposition to the well-being of his pocket, but he is philanthropist enough to care more for humanity in the abstract than in the concrete.

Mrs. Lake spoke in the evening in her usual entertaining and logical manner. We are certain Mrs. Lake always pleased her audiences, because immediately after her lectures there was a great call for her pictures, which is a sure indication that she is liked and that her lecture was appreciated.

Thursday morning, as were other mornings, was devoted to conference, in which short speeches were in order. Some of the best things said were in the conferences, but we could not get the names of the speakers, having to attend to our book-stand.

Thursday afternoon session was more fully attended than any of Wednesday's sessions. Mr. S. D. Moore was the first speaker. His address was upon "Knowledge." He was aggressiv, pitching into the churches and handling their creeds and dogmas without gloves. Mr. Moore is not a polished orator, but he is exceedingly forceful and in earnest. If there were as hard-working a Liberal in every town in the country the life of falsehood and error would be short. After Mr. Moore had concluded, Mr. Peck sang a song called "Dem Golden Slippers," which was much enjoyed by the audience. After the laughter provoked by the song had died away Dr. Brown introduced Prof. W. S. Bell, who gave an address upon "Morality," the same that was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago. Our readers all know Mr. Bell for a deep thinker and logical reasoner, as well as genial gentleman. His paper was highly appreciated by the audience. After Mr. Bell's lecture Dr. Brown was called upon to recite the poem upon "Orthodoxy," which he did with good effect. It is the same that he recited at the rededication of Paine's monument, and which we then published in these columns. It is good any time.

Just before the hour for the evening exercises to commence it began to rain, but, notwithstanding, the audience was larger than on the previous night. Before the hour for the regular speaker to take his place had arrived the time was filled in with short speeches from members of the audience, and by Dr. Brown, the drift of whose remarks was that the Christian religion put a premium upon sin by leading the devotee to believe that no matter how often or how serious were the crimes he committed he would be saved in the end by professing faith in Christ. He said: "They ask us what we will giv in the place of Christianity. We will giv honest and hard work. According to the Christian creed I can sin as long as I please and Jesus will settle the bill, if I repent early enough. But Freethinkers will settle their own bills. I think that God will save my soul if it is worth saving. If it is not worth saving it is unkind and improper to ask him to save it." After a beautiful piece of music, "The Little Ones at Home," by Mr. Peck, the speaker of the evening, Prof. J. H. W. Toohey, of Boston, was introduced, and held the audience some two hours by a very eloquent address under the title of "Liberty vs. Catholicism." After Prof. Toohey had concluded, another song was sung by Mr. Peck and the meeting adjourned.

Friday morning the Convention listened to Dr. H. A. Lamb, of Portland, Me. He reviewed what Christianity had done. He is a forcible and pleasing speaker, and is very aggressiv toward the church. He related how he went to his coal dealer, from whom he had purchased tons of coal, when Mr. Bennett was in prison, and asked him to sign the petition for his release. The coal dealer refused, and "from that day to this," said Dr. Lamb, "I havn't bought an ounce of coal of that man, and I never shall." He went to his grocer with the petition, a man with whom he had dealt for years, who hemmed and hawed awhile and then refused to sign. Dr. Lamb left him and went to another, who also refused. The honest doctor left him in disgust and went still further, until he found one who was Liberal enough to ask Mr. Hayes to do an act of justice. That man got his trade. Awhile after he met his old grocer on the street. "See here, Dr. Lamb, I'll sign that petition," said he. "No you won't," answered Dr. Lamb. "You wouldn't sign it before when you had a chance, and now you want to sign it to get my trade. I ain't that kind of a man. Good morning." And the Christian grocer laments to this day that he refused to sign the petition for the release of D. M. Bennett. Dr. Lamb said he was rocked in the cradle of orthodoxy, his father having been a Baptist preacher. "We are taught," he said, "about Jesus in the Christian Bible, and told about the birth, crucifixion, and ascension of Christ and the promis of the scriptures that he should liv forever in the songs of his people. It was false. Christ won't liv forever any more than Chrishna or Buddha, who are as good Christs as any. The promulgation of Christianity has caused enough bloodshed to float the navies of the world. Millions of infants hav starved to death in China, and where was Jesus? Suppose a child should stray away and be threatened with starvation and death, would not every one with human feeling wish to seek and save it?" The doctor said that Christianity is responsible for crime and insanity. Our jails and prisons are filled in consequence of the Christian religion. Orthodoxy is responsible, because these criminals hav been taught by religious teachers that they could commit crime and go to Jesus for pardon and salvation, and it would be all right. If they had been taught Infidelity there would be scarcely a prisoner in the world. He said that ninety-nine out of one hundred in the insane asylums are there because they believed in the Christian religion and were not taught that disobedience of nature's laws must be punished by disease and insanity. The Sunday-school teachers had told these people who are now criminals and lunatics that sin could be forgiven and washed away, and they lie, they lie, they lie to you!

When Dr. Lamb had concluded, Dr. Brown took the floor and gave an essay upon the human body, its functions, composition, and necessities. Every man, he said, should know his body, and then reflect upon its wonderful mechanism and try to be a healthy human being. He spoke at considerable length on the importance of pure air and the bad effects which resulted from depriving the body of this prime necessity. "Oxygen," said the doctor, "is God. It is useless to shut out oxygen and pray for health." He said he would not deny the existence of a future life, because he didn't know whether there was one or not, and he would not object to the people entertaining a thousand hopes for another life, but he would say, "May oxygen bless you!"

Friday afternoon the attendance was good. Many ladies were present, and also many gentlemen whose faces, said the Hornellsville Tribune, more than one Hornellsville pastor would declare belonged to some of his most prominent church-members. The first speaker was Prof. Toohey, who spoke upon Spiritualism. He was followed by Lyman C. Howe, another Spiritualist, who took issue at a previous conference with Mr. Moore, who denounced the Christian plan of shutting Infidel publications out of the mails, and Mr. Howe thought religious people should be protected against Freethought publications; but as he did not say when their rights had been infringed his remarks were not thought of sufficient weight to be answered. He spoke with his physical eyes shut and said many things that indicated that his mental eyes were in the same condition. His subject was "Environments and their Centers." Mr. Howe made one good point by asking why the clergy did not accept the invitation to appear upon the platform and express their views.

Friday evening session was attended by about two hundred and seventy-five persons. After a song by Mr. Peck, George Chainey spoke. He took for his subject, "Nothing." He said there is no such thing as nothing, but if the earth, sun, moon, and stars were made from nothing there ought to be enough left over to make one respectable lecture. The Bible, he said, is the text-book of the science of nothing. Its first sentence foreshadows the tone of the whole book: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." We cannot conceive of a beginning, or nothing. God is another name for nothing. He is described as without body, shape, members, or passions. That is a good definition of nothing. Furthermore, he is three nothings occupying the same place at the same time—which must be somethings. There can be no such thing as nothing—it is unthinkable—for space is everywhere and always existed. We cannot conceive of the creation of matter and motion. We cannot conceive of the orthodox God. Mr. Chainey paid a glowing tribute to President Garfield, who, from next to nothing, had by the force of his own character and genius raised himself to the highest place in the greatest nation on the earth. Many prayers hav been said for him, but Christians would not dare to leave him to the mercy of the Lord without the help of the best physicians in the land. Guiteau represents the bloody deeds of Christianity, for he claims to hav been inspired.

At the Saturday morning conference Mr. Toohey took hold of an Elmira correspondent of the Hornellsville Tribune, who had cast some slurs upon the convention. He handled him very readily, making him the text of a really fine discourse. After Mr. Toohey had finished Prof. Bell read the speech prepared by Hon. Elizur Wright, who is too feeble to stand the strain of a long journey in such hot, dusty weather, and so was unable to be present in person. Like all of Mr. Wright's utterances, it was clear and sharp. The subject was, "What Will You Put in Its Place?" It is the oft-asked question of Christians, and was tellingly answered by the old veteran of Liberalism. We shall print the whole lecture one of these days.

Saturday afternoon Courtlandt Palmer read an address upon the social aspect of Liberalism. He thought the strength of the church lay in its capacity for supplying its votaries with social pleasures, which bound them together more strongly than the dogmas did or could; that to combat it successfully it was necessary to meet it upon its own ground, to construct temples and establish a social life based upon Liberal principles. Mr. Palmer said he had studied the question thoroughly and had planned a magnificent temple which should cost $2,000,000, the lower portion to be devoted to business purposes in order to raise a fund to meet the running expenses of the portion devoted to the people, so that it might be self-sustaining. The scheme had the sanction of prominent business and public men. At the first meeting $3,000 was subscribed, and he was quite enthusiastic over the prospects. He did not ask this meeting to invest; that was not his object. He wanted simply to excite an interest in the project.

Mr. Palmer was followed by Reuben Dailey, editor or the Jeffersonville Evening News, an abstract of whose speech will be found on another page. He is an interesting speaker and a superior elocutionist.

In the evening Mrs. Lake again addressed the meeting. A blind confidence, she said, had been placed by the people in their priests, but when Infidel science began to count the stars and dig into the secrets of the earth, then men doubted and began to rely upon themselvs. Morality looked in the insolent face of religion and declared that all men were equal. In places ruled by priests miracles and misery liv side by side. Her closing was very beautiful and interesting.

She was followed by Mr. Chainey, who spoke upon the Bible story of Jacob and Esau, which he characterized as the most disgraceful affair imaginable, condemning strongly the reprehensible conduct of Jacob, and denouncing the moral to be drawn from it as a Bible story. He referred to Bradlaugh's expulsion from Parliament as the act of the spirit which is the relic of barbarism.

When he had concluded, Mrs. Lake read an interesting poem by Lizzie Doten, which was warmly applauded, after which Mr. Peck sang a very laughable song, which put everyone in good humor for their sleep.

Sunday forenoon Mr. Moore opened the convention, after which Mr. Putnam spoke upon the "Glory of Infidelity." The substance of his discourse was that all reformers must necessarily be regarded as Infidels by those that they left. Martin Luther, the great reformer and founder of Protestantism, was regarded as an Infidel by the Catholic church, then the great ruler of the religious world. The poets Shelley and Shakspere were regarded as Infidels. All great minds, and especially all who attempted to counteract the evils of their day, were put in that category by their opponents.

He was succeeded by Mr. Leland, who read his report as secretary of the National Liberal League to the Freethinkers' Congress at London upon the "Progress of Liberalism the Past Year in the United States." We shall lay it before our readers at as early a date as possible. At the conclusion three cheers were given for Bradlaugh.

In the afternoon Reuben Dailey and Mr. Moore spoke again, after which Mrs. Jennie Macdonald sang "Genevieve," and then Mr. Chainey spoke upon "The Clergy." He began by saying that he would not abuse them or call them as hard names as did one whom they now worship as a God, who called them whited sepulchers, liars, and children of their father, the devil. As fathers, sons, husbands, and citizens, many of them are above criticism. He gave a history of the priesthood as it originated among the savage tribes and developed among the civilized. The priesthood, as originally established, changed into priestcraft and perpetrated itself by inventing miracles with which to delude their simple people in order to retain their power. The origin of priestcraft was similar to kingcraft, and the two hav been working hand in hand as a sort of mutual benefit society. The power and influence of the church is rapidly leaving it. The best intellects are now found outside its pale. Science, railroads, electricity, telegraphs, telephones, etc., are the apostles of the new dispensation. Let the telegraph be used like the post-office and all the great discoveries of the age be brought in the reach of all people, and the golden age will cease to be a superstition of the past or a dim hope of the future, but a grand realization of the present. Mr. Chainey said he was a Materialist. He would rather die and sleep the dreamless sleep of eternity, reappearing only in the grass and the beautiful flowers, or even in the dust of the highway, stirred by the hurrying foot of enterprise, than suffer eternally in hell or sit with folded, useless hands forever in heaven. "If there is a God who can make people suffer forever and forever the agonies described by the Bible, I would want to suffer with him, that I might curse him with every breath."

At the conclusion of Mr. Chainey's sermon Mr. Peck sang "The Devil is Dead," and the Convention adjourned till evening.

Upon reassembling, Mrs. Lake recited a poem of Lizzie Doten's, after which Mr. Wakeman was introduced and delivered a sermon, taking for his text the sentence of William K. Clifford's, "Those who can read the signs of the times read in them that the kingdom of man is at hand." Under the old dispensation he said it was the chief end of man to glorify God, but under the new dispensation it is to glorify man. The only way to glorify man is to do him good and to serve him, and every point of our life must be adjusted to the new doctrin. What shall we call it? Let us call it the "Liberal." Even the word "Infidel" has no terrors for us. We can make it respectable. The name of "Quakers" was applied as a term of ridicule or reproach, but they adopted it and made it respectable. So with the Puritans as well. The new dispensation makes it a crime for a man to injure himself, as well as his neighbor. Mr. Wakeman then cited the new code of laws which went into operation on September 1st. All old laws were raked up in it. Some of its provisions, passed nearly a century ago, made it a penal offense to use profane language or desecrate the Sabbath, a penalty of $500 being attached. He drew a graphic picture of the state of affairs existing in this state under the present penal code. He cited the case of the arrest of a young Italian boy for picking up rags in the streets of New York, and his sentence to the Protectory for eleven years. This he claimed was a disgrace to civilization, and the Liberal people should see that the laws were repealed or amended. The institutions to which the young people were sentenced are under control of either the Catholic or Protestant sects; and as they are paid by the head for the keeping of these children, it is to their interest to get as many of them and to keep them as long as possible. This they do by misstating their ages, thus keeping them until they are long past the age at which they should be discharged. The influence and power of the church are increased by this policy, but the effect is demoralizing and tyrannical. The speaker said that the aim of the Freethinkers should be to correct these abuses and wrongs, and he, for one, desired to labor for the complete destruction of the power of the church, believing that thus the interests of humanity could best be served. It is the object of the Liberals to put the school-house in the place of the church and the schoolmaster in the place of the minister. Let us worship purity wherever we find it. We can make a character for purity by living proper lives, and when made keep it clean. We can form our own idea of purity. That is the kind of art in which we can all be artists.

After the sermon, which was listened to very attentivly and thoughtfully, Mr. Green made a report of the receipts to pay expenses of the convention, which were $215, a sum amply sufficient. He offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously and heartily adopted:

Resolved, That we tender to Dr. Shattuck our sincere thanks for his liberal donation to this association—the use of his Opera House for the holding of this and last year's convention.

Resolved, That we also thank the secular press of this and adjoining towns for the fair manner that we hav been treated by it.

Resolved, That we gratefully thank the proprietors of the public houses of this town, and the various railroads that lead to this place, for the favors they hav granted us.

The following resolutions, affiliating the New York State Freethinkers' Association with the National Liberal League, were adopted:

Resolved, That this association reaffirms the platform adopted at its convention, held at Watkins Glen, in August, 1878, and recommends that it be reprinted and circulated as expressing the general objects of this association, and that if the National Liberal League adopt that platform at its next congress to be held at Chicago, the officers of this association be authorized and instructed to take out a charter for this society that will constitute it an auxiliary state League. That we earnestly recommend that all Liberal-minded people join some Liberal organization in their neighborhood, of such as it is, and that if there is none they secure such organization without delay, to the end that there be a general union of all the Liberals of our country, for defense, for secular education of the people, for the advancement of Liberal views, and culture.

Resolved, That in addition to resolutions of approval of the course of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, formerly passed by this association, we wish now to send word directly to Mr. Bradlaugh of our admiration of his heroic course in asserting his right to his seat in the House of Commons, to which he has been repeatedly elected, and from which he is kept by the mere brutal force and mob violence of bigotry. That we call the world to witness that Christian superstition in dogging him with dangerous violence from the performance of his duties as a representativ of the people proves again that it has really no respect for duty or decency, and that it is the same selfish, vindictiv, persecuting master which has filled the world with blood and suffering. That we sympathize with and urge all who are near and who can aid Mr. Bradlaugh in his whole struggle, and we assure him that we will do all we can here to crush the infamy against which he contends for freedom and the representativ rights of the people.

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the example of Hon. O. M. Roberts, the governor of Texas, in declining to issue any proclamation for prayers or fasts by the people of that state for any purpose. That the noble Jeffersonian grounds upon which he has based his declination to do so recalls the glorious and better days of the republic, when the separation of church and state was the undoubted resolve of our people and the foundation of their liberties.

The following letter was received from Col. Ingersoll. The convention regretted his absence as much as himself:

"LONG BRANCH, Sept. 1, 1881.

"MY DEAR DR. BROWN: I regret that my engagements will not allow me to be with you next Sunday. Of course I hav a great interest in all efforts to do away forever with idiotic dogmas that fill the world with hate and misery. You will hav plenty of speakers, and I hope plenty of hearers. Giv my best regards to Messrs. Green, Bell, and Shattuck. Hope that your convention will be a great success. I am yours always,

"R. G. INGERSOLL."

A list of the officers elected for the ensuing year will be found in the secretary's report in another column.

Although the weather was very warm all through the convention week, everybody was sorry when the time came to separate. For ourselvs, we found many friends whom we had known by correspondence for a long time, and we felt pained that social personal intercourse could be enjoyed for only five days. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon Dr. Shattuck for his ceaseless efforts to make the convention comfortable and feel at home. He personally superintended the conduct of the house. His employees, also, were very obliging. The hotels at Hornellsville are good comfortable ones. The Osborne House is the largest, and most of the speakers stopped there. The proprietor did all he could to make his Liberal guests comfortable. At the other hotels the landlords were equally kind. All in all, the week spent at Hornellsville was one of the pleasantest we ever enjoyed, and we look forward to the reunion next year at Watkins with anxious joy.

MRS. A. C. MACDONALD will lecture before the Liberal Club next Friday evening, Sept. 23d. The subject announced is "Universological Explanation of World and Man," but the lecture will really be a reply to one of T. B. Wakeman's before the same club, with whom the lecturess differs in some points in regard to Universology. A controversy has been going on a number of years between Mr. Andrews, the eminent metaphysician and Universologist, and his school on the one side and Mr. Wakeman on the other over the legitimate use of the terms universe, world, cosmos, etc., Wakeman contending that universe etymologically means a one-turn, a conception derived from a false system of astronomy—the Ptolemaic—and as that system has been overturned and upset by a newer and true system, consequently the conception of a one-turn has been upset too and should be set aside. The Andrewsians contend that the conception of the Universe has changed too and continues to mean "the whole of everything," and so of the world and cosmos.

Mrs. Macdonald, who has been a student of Universology the last few years, intends to answer Mr. Wakeman's objection and also his denial of an assertion on which Mr. Andrews is willing to rest the claims of Universology, "that the laws of thinking and the laws of creativ energy in the universe are one."

BY the National Reformer of the 4th inst. we are very glad to learn that Mr. Bradlaugh has made good progress toward health, although not entirely out of the doctor's hands. On Aug. 31st he asked Mr. Bennett to visit him at his house, being unable to leave it himself, and our readers will probably in a week or more hear from him more direct. Since his confinement to his house several persons, none of them giving their names, but all stating that they are Christians, hav lately honored him with letters assuring him that he will go to hell. One says that if he again tries to take his seat he shall send him there by shooting him. Two write that they hav prayed he may not recover, and he has in addition received a heap of tracts and religious books. Such is Christian charity as exemplified by the English church.

OUR readers will regret to learn that the shingle mill of Mr. F. D. Lacy, of Nirvana, Mich., whose scientific contributions hav frequently appeared in our columns, was burned on the morning of the 8th inst. Loss about $3,000. No insurance. It is pretty clearly understood that it was set on fire. A new mill is being rapidly built.

THE next quarterly meeting of the Spiritualists of western New York will be held in the Sons of Temperance Hall, over 44 Main street, Lockport, Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 24th and 25th. C. Fannie Allyn and other speakers will be present. All are invited.

MRS. H. S. LAKE spoke at Friendship, N. Y., the 12th; will speak at Angola, Ind., the 18th; will be at the League Congress, Sept. 30th, Oct. 1st, and 2d, and begin a two months' engagement Sunday evening, Oct. 9th, at Elgin, Ill. Societies wishing her services on week evenings will address her at Elgin, Ill., Drawer 47.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Six Days in Ireland.—Continued.

At Drogheda we passed over the river Boyne near where the celebrated battle took place some two hundred and forty years ago, which the Orangemen are so fond of referring to, and where the forces of Cromwell were especially cruel to the Irish. Here it is, I think, where the mouth of the river forms something of a harbor, and considerable shipping was seen. When within some fifteen or twenty miles of Dublin the road brought us in sight of the Irish Sea on the east, with some shipping and a fine farming country immediately around us. Here we saw the first grain being harvested since arriving in Europe. The farmers were cutting it with imperfect cradles, and even sickles, while women were raking and binding. It is about as common to see women working in the hay and harvest fields as men. I have seen them pitching, loading, and stacking hay. I have noticed but one or two mowers or reapers in Ireland; the principal part of the hay, which is a large crop here, is cut with the scythe. I have seen no women mowing. Much hay still remains to be cut, though in our country the 20th of August is regarded as late haying time. It is a wonder how they manage here to secure their heavy crops of hay when it rains nearly every day. It is cured largely in small shocks, in which the hay stands for two or three weeks, when it is put into stacks. I see very few barns, and they of small size. The farmers' or peasants' houses are chiefly small, rude affairs, with one low story, very small windows and doors, the walls of stone, and the roofs of straw, and down close to the doors and windows. The floors are usually of stone, concrete, or gravel, with very little wood about any part of them. They are dark, damp, and cheerless houses, and the majority of those I have seen are untidily kept. I fear the Bridgets in humble life are not first-class housekeepers. There are some houses somewhat better built, with tile or slate roof, flowers growing round the door, and having an air of neatness apparent; but these are rather exceptions than the rule. The houses of the poor have no door-yards, no window-shutters, no flowers, no signs of comfort or neatness. I also see very few mansions or homes of those well off, as are very frequently seen in Scotland, and still more so in England. There is indeed very little evidence of wealth in Ireland save in the growing crops and the herds and flocks, and these or their products are largely sent to England to pay rent and taxes. Many of the land owners live in England, and either have the cattle raised for them, on their own account, or their tenants send the cattle raised to pay the rent. Though Ireland produces largely of fine cattle and sheep—a finer grazing country existing nowhere—people probably do not get the chance to eat one-tenth part of the beef and mutton produced; nearly all goes to fill the stomachs of English lords and more fortunate English gentlemen. These will have their roast beef and their mutton chops, while the poor producers must manage to do without them, and partially fill their empty stomachs with potatoes.

We arrived in Dublin at a little past 6 P. M., having made the distance of 113 miles from Belfast in about three hours. We had an opportunity to view the town for an hour or two, and find it a pleasant, well-built city, with wide streets and fine public edifices. There are but few finer cities than Dublin. It is situated on both sides of the river Leffey, with a fair harbor. Her shipping interests ought to be extensive, but I fear they suffer from the general depression which seems to cover the country.

Sackville street, west of the Laffey, is a beautiful thoroughfare, and Carlisle Bridge at the foot of it, crossing the river, is a fine stone structure and the widest bridge I remember of seeing, though not very long, standing on three arches. The monuments of Lord Nelson, Daniel O'Connell (now being completed), and the statues of many of Erin's distinguished sons grace the city in ample profusion. The old House of Parliament, now occupied by the Bank of Ireland, the City Hall, Trinity College, the museums, and a goodly number of other public buildings, are rich and imposing specimens of architecture. The better buildings in the center of the city are built of what looks like gray granite and Portland stone, but the bulk of the dwellings, away from the center of the town, are of brick, four or five stories high, but mostly very plain, without cornices, window frames, and caps.

I am often painfully reminded of the absence of good fruit in this country. There are gooseberries, a few plums, and some puckering pears, but apples are scarce and very inferior, being only about the size of acorns, knurly, hard, and unpalatable. I am sure an American pig would feel himself disgraced by eating them. I am fond of fruit, and seeing some good looking apples on a Dublin woman's fruit stand I approached it and inquired, "Are these apples grown in Ireland?"

"No, them is American apples."

"Well, I will take a couple of them from the high respect I bear the good lady Columbia."

The apples tasted good and reminded me of home.

Mr. Bridges, feeling weary and not very well, took himself to the hotel and retired early, while I, feeling more youthful and enterprising, visited the Gaiety theater to witness the Carl Rosa traveling company play the English opera of the "Bohemian Girl," and I must say I was highly pleased with the evening's entertainment; the rendition was splendid, and the large theater was packed to its fullest capacity, some hundreds having to stand up. This is the first place of amusement I have attended in a long time, and I found that it did not hurt me at all. In fact I was so well pleased that I persuaded Mr. Bridges to accompany me the following night to hear and see "Carmen," which was also good, and almost perfectly rendered. The company is probably English, though in the spoken parts some of them seemed to speak like Americans. The Dublinians appreciate them highly.

Saturday, Aug. 20th.—We intended to have made a trip to Kingstown, Bray, Wicklow, and the Valley Ovoca, but it rained so steadily that we abandoned it and visited the museums, St. Patrick's Cathedral, and others of the public buildings, managing in the mean time to get pretty thoroughly wet; the rain being more like a regular American soaker than anything hitherto met with on this side of the Atlantic. The principal museum contains a very large collection of the antiquities of all nations, old works of art, a full department of natural history in stuffed birds, animals, reptiles, the skeletons of saurians, mammoth elk, deer, and other animals not in fashion now, with a full assortment of sea-shells of all varieties, and thousands of specimens of geological formations, and minerals. I should not omit to say that among all the rest to be seen are scores and hundreds of gods, little and big, which nations have worshiped, and which were once thought to govern the world, but have now entirely lost their power. I have seen no finer collection of curiosities, ancient and modern, save in the British Museum at London.

The Royal College of Science, and institution for the instruction of teachers and others in industrial science, contains a library and an interesting museum.

The Royal College of Surgeons, near Stephen's Green, a beautiful plot of ground surrounded by nice residences, is a fine edifice. On the pediments are statutes of Minerva, Hygeia, and Esculapius. The museum is the chief attraction and contains a good osteological collection, including the skeletons of elephants, deer, bears, elk, dogs, monkeys, etc., as well as of human beings.

The National Picture Gallery, with a statue of Dargan in front, stands in beautiful and capacious grounds, called Leinster Lawn, opposite to the Museum of Natural History, and contains several galleries of very respectable paintings, prominent among which are portraits of Ireland's distinguished sons.

Trinity College is a fine, imposing edifice, immediately opposite the Bank of Ireland, formerly the House of Parliament. The external façade, 300 feet in length, is of Portland stone and is ornamented with tall columns let into the wall and supporting an elegant pediment. At the entrance are fine bronze statues of Burke and Goldsmith. The first courtyard is decorated with illustrious characters, many of whom were students of the college and graduated here; among them are Dean Swift, Burkeley, Archbishop King, and Molyneaux. Here is a monument of Provost Baldwin, a liberal benefactor to the college; he is represented in a reclining position, with an angel at his feet holding a palm branch, with the genius of the university bending over him. The dining hall contains portraits of Grattan, and many others of Ireland's great men. A handsome granite bell tower in the middle of the quadrangle is ornamented with statues of divinity, medicine, law, and science. The library is 270 feet in length and contains over 300,000 volumes. Other fine edifices will have to pass unnoticed.
